[By Holland, Norvell, and Yeager.]

House concurrent resolution memorializing the National Congress to enact legislation that will restore the rivers tributary to the Mississippi and the Arkansas rivers to navigable streams.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives and the senate, That the following memorial be adopted and transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress for formal delivery to the President of the United States and the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, to wit:

MEMORIAL.

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

GENTLEMEN: The senate and house of representatives representing the people of Oklahoma earnestly and respectfully call your attention to the importance of the Arkansas River as one of the great national highways prepared by nature for the internal commerce of the United States.

The volume of water, especially from Tulsa, forms a noble stream capable of a depth of 6 feet of water at all stages, which can be established at approximately the same cost as a double-track railroad along its banks. The importance of cheap transportation we do not discuss. The enlightened opinion of the United States has debated that question thoroughly, and the verdict has been rendered that the waterways of the United States shall be improved without delay.

We call your attention to important reports which demonstrate the fact that the Arkansas River has been navigated by the Government itself from the earliest history of the Western settlement until railroad transportation caused the abandonment of river traffic.

Special reference is made to the report of Captain Aberts—Executive Document No. 295, House of Representatives, Forty-first Congress, second session, enumerating twenty steamboats on this stream (1870).

Captain Tabor, in his report for 1885 and 1886, House Document No. 150, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.

The report of Amos Stickney, lieutenant-colonel of Engineers, estimates that the stream can be put in perfect condition from Tulsa to the Mississippi River, 342 miles, for approximately $27,677,200, and that the cost from Tulsa to Fort Smith would be approximately $6,226,225 for a 6-foot channel and abundant improvement.

Attention is called to the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Stickney, of December, 1900, House Document No. 150, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.

In view of the fact that Tulsa is surrounded by enormous coal fields in Oklahoma continguous to the Arkansas River and that it is in the midst of the greatest oil and gas fields in the world, it is of national importance as well of State importance that the Arkansas River be immediately developed.

We therefore on behalf of Oklahoma and on behalf of the entire tributary West respectfully pray that a fund sufficient shall be provided not only for the prompt development of the Mississippi from the Lakes to the Gulf, but the great branch of the Mississippi which penetrates our State shall be immediately provided for in a substantial manner.

The State of Oklahoma is in favor of the development of the waterways of the United States, and believes that an appropriation of not less than fifty millions annually should be devoted to this purpose.

We ask, therefore, that this be done and that such part thereof shall be devoted to the improvement of the Arkansas as is justified by the flow of water of that great stream and the great commerce contiguous thereto, or will be naturally tributary to the great transportation opportunities established on that river, and that not less than 25 per cent of that sum be expended upon improvements within the State of Oklahoma.

We respectfully emphasize the generally conceded fact that the railroads of the country are inadequate to handle our present immense commerce. We emphasize the fact that the railroads are more suitable to carry commerce of a more perishable nature or which for other reasons a quicker and more expensive transportation is required, while the waterways of our country can be more judicially used for heavy and cheap commodities.

We ask, therefore, to give immediate vitality to the wish and need of the nation for the systematic development at once of our internal waterways, of which the Arkansas River is one of the most valuable and most important.

The foregoing house concurrent resolution, consisting of seven pages, having been placed upon final passage, has received two-thirds of the votes of all the representatives elected to and constituting the house of representatives, I therefore declare the same to be duly and constitutionally adopted, and I sign the same in open session this 17th day of March, 1908.

WM. H. MURRAY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed senate April 22, 1908.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 11, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War with recommendation that the accompanying bill (H. R. 17707, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) to authorize the construction of a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and to divert a portion of its waters through a channel into the said river again, to create electric power, be amended as indicated in red thereon.

As thus amended I am of opinion that the bill makes ample provision for the protection of navigation interests, and I know of no objection to its favorable consideration by Congress so far as those interests are concerned.

SMITH S. LEACH,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

[Third indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 12, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, inviting attention to the foregoing report of the Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and to the accompanying copy of amended bill referred to.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Following is a copy of a letter of the President received after the bill was referred to this committee:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 13, 1908.

SIR: Numerous bills granting water rights in conformity with the general act of June 21, 1906, have been introduced during the present session of Congress and some of these have already passed. While the general act authorizes the limitations and restrictions of water rights in the public interest and would seem to warrant making a reasonable charge for the benefits conferred, those bills which have come to my attention do not seem to guard the public interests adequately in these respects. The effect of granting privileges such as are conferred by these bills, as I said in a recent message, "taken together with rights already acquired under State laws, would be to give away properties of enormous value. Through lack of foresight we have formed the habit of granting without compensation extremely valuable rights amounting to monopolies on navigable streams and on the public domain. The repurchase at great expense of water rights thus carelessly given away without return has already begun in the East, and before long will be necessary in the West also. No rights involving water power should be granted to any corporation in perpetuity, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow them to conduct their business profitably. A reasonable charge should of course be made for valuable rights and privileges which they obtain from the National Government. The values for which this charge is made will ultimately, through the natural growth and orderly development of our population and industries, reach enormous amounts. A fair share of the increase should be safeguarded for the benefit of the people, from whose labor it springs. The proceeds thus secured, after the cost of administration and improvement has been met, should naturally be devoted to the development of our inland waterways." Accordingly, I have decided to sign no bills hereafter which do not provide specifically for the right to fix and make a charge and for a definite limitation in time of the rights conferred.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The bill, together with the foregoing letter, was referred to the War Department for its views, which are presented in the following indorsements:

[Second indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 11, 1908.

1. Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

2. The Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate refers H. R. 17707, Sixtieth Congress, first session, being a bill to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across the James River, Missouri, and to "divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power."

3. This bill was referred to this Department for report during its consideration in the House of Representatives, and after the usual inquiry through the local engineer officer, was reported on on March 11, 1908, to the effect that, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned, there is no objection to its passage.

4. Subsequently, March 18, 1908, the President of the United States, in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, stated that all bills of this character not having provision for a limited life and a remuneration to the United States for the privileges or rights conveyed, will fail to receive Executive approval. The Senate Committee on Commerce now desires the opinion of the War Department upon the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage "in view of the letter of the President to the chairman of the committee."

5. The Chief of Engineers notes that the bill H. R. 17707 as it now stands does not comply with either of the President's requirements, and it is not believed that such requirements are provided for in the general dam act of June 21, 1906.

6. The following provision, if inserted in H. R. 17707, after the words "nineteen hundred and six," line 6, page 2, will, it is believed, accomplish the objects aimed at:

"and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with said act, and as a part of the conditions and stipulations provided for therein, fix such limitation of time for the privilege hereby permitted, and such charge or charges for the same as they may deem necessary to protect the present or future interests of the United States."

The details as to time and amount in each case will depend upon the facts in each case, including amount of investment relative to the interests of navigation, and the amount of future responsibility which may have to be assumed by the Government in the matter of proper maintenance of dams, operation of locks, and other items, including possible failure of grantee, which may bear upon any liabilities which the Government by chance might possibly be called upon to assume. While in the form of legislation suggested no definite time or amount is considered, it is appreciated that in each case such time and amount would require consideration by the grantor in advance of preliminary work by the grantee.

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[Third indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 14, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, concurring in the foregoing views of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Following is the amendment suggested by the War Department:

Insert on page 2, line 6, after the word "six," the following:

"and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with the terms of said act, impose conditions and stipulations fixing such limitation of time for the privilege hereby permitted and such charge or charges for the same as they may deem necessary to protect the present or future interests of the United States."

The President, in a communication addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, dated March 18 last, as well as in his veto message of April 17 relating to the bill H. R. 15444 to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River, has declared it to be his policy not to approve of any bill permitting the construction of a dam by private parties across a navigable stream, although due provision is made for the conservation of the stream for the purposes of navigation, unless the bill provides for the payment of a royalty or compensation to the United States for the use of the water of the stream for purposes other than navigation.

This is a new departure from the policy heretofore pursued in respect to legislation authorizing the construction of such dams, and in view of this fact it becomes important to inquire whether the Government of the United States has the right to require compensation for the use of water in such streams for purposes other than navigation.

The common-law doctrine of England that a stream is not deemed to be a navigable water course unless the tide ebbs and flows in it is not the law in this country. The question whether a water course is a navigable stream is one of fact. If it is capable of being used for the purposes of trade and commerce in any mode, even for floating rafts of logs and timber, it is deemed to be a navigable stream.

(St. Anthony Water Power Co. v. St. Paul Water Commissioners, 168 U. S., 349.)

The title to the water of a navigable stream within the borders of a State is not in the Federal Government, but in the State; and title to the banks and bed of the stream, after the Federal Government has parted with its riparian lands, is either in the State or in the riparian owner, or both, according to the laws of the respective States. These principles have been laid down and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following, among other cases, and is the settled law of the land, to wit: Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 367); Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212); Goodtitle v. Kibbe (9 How., 471); Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324); St. Louis v. Myers (113 U. S., 566); Packer v. Bird (137 U. S., 661); Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371); Kaukauna Water Power Company v. Green Bay and Mississippi Canal Company (142 U. S., 254); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1); Water Power Company v. Water Commissioners (168 U. S., 349); Kean v. Calumet Canal Company (190 U. S., 452); United States v. The Chandler Dunbar Water Power Company (U. S. Supreme Court, April 20, 1908).

The use of water in such a stream is a matter of State regulation and State control. In many of the States the common-law rule, as defined in the following language of Chancellor Kent, prevails, to wit:

"Every proprietor of lands on the banks of a river has naturally an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands, as it was wont to run (currere solebat) without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has a right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him, unless he has a prior right to divert it or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat is the language of the law. Though he may use the water while it runs over his land as an incident to the land, he can not unreasonably detain it, or give it another direction, and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate."

In the mining and arid States the rule of prior appropriation for mining and irrigation purposes prevails, and this rule of the States has been recognized by Federal Statutes (R. S., secs. 2339–2340). In some of the States there is a mixed application, as in California, of the common-law rule and the rule of prior appropriation.

But whatever rule may prevail in any State as to the use of the water in a stream, it is always subject to the following limitations, laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company (174 U. S., 690):

"Although this power of changing the common-law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its water; so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable water courses of the country even against any State action."

Where the Federal Government is not interested as the owner of riparian lands, the only interest it has in the water of a stream is as to its use for purposes of navigation, and it can lay no claim to the use of the water for any other purpose, not even for irrigation. (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S., 46.)

In this case the United States appeared as intervenor; but inasmuch as it founded its claim not on the question of navigation, but on the question of irrigation, the court held that it had no ground for intervention and dismissed its petition. In reference to this subject the court says:

"It follows from this that if in the present case the National Government was asserting, as against either Kansas or Colorado, that the appropriation for the purposes of irrigation of the waters of the Arkansas was affecting the navigability of the stream, it would become our duty to determine the truth of the charge. But the Government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

"It rested its petition of intervention upon its alleged duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands. * * *

"Turning to the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is enough to say that no one of them by any implication refers to the reclamation of arid lands. * * *

"While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same (no greater and no less) than those within the limits of the original thirteen, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation."

It was the doctrine at common law that a grant of land upon the borders of a navigable stream carried the grant only to high-water mark, while a grant of land bordering upon a nonnavigable stream carried the ownership to the center or thread of the stream, subject to the public easement.

In the case of Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 384), the Supreme Court states:

"The United States have not repealed the common law as to the interpretation of their own grants, nor explained what interpretation or limitation should be given to or imposed upon the terms of the ordinary conveyances which they use, except in a few special instances; but these are left to the principles of law and rules adopted by each local government where the land may lie. We have adopted the common law, and must, therefore, apply its principles to the interpretation of their grant."

Further on the court states the same principle in this form:

"In our judgment the grants of the Government for lands bounded on streams and other waters without any reservation or limitation of terms are to be construed as to their effect according to the laws of the state in which the lands lie."

The rule of riparian ownership as to grants of land bordering on a navigable stream is diverse in the various States. Some States hold that the grant extends only to high-water mark; other States hold that it extends to low-water mark, while another class of States—and perhaps the most numerous—hold that the grant extends to the middle of the stream, subject to the public easement in the water of the stream. But whatever may be the law in this respect as to the effect of the grant, it only relates to the proprietorship in the banks and bed of the stream, and not to the ownership of the water in the stream.

In those States which hold that the title of the riparian owner only extends to the high or low water mark, the title to the bed of the stream is deemed to be in the State, and whether the title to the bed of the stream is in the riparian owner or in the State, in either case the general title to the water of the stream is deemed to be in the State, but it holds it not absolutely, but in trust for all lawful public uses. The State's interest in such a stream is akin to that of a riparian owner, though more comprehensive and general in its nature, and does not exist in hostility to or in diminution of the rights of the riparian owner.

(People's Ice Co. v. Davenport, 149 Mass., 322.)
(Brown v. Cunningham, 82 Iowa, 512.)
(Martin et al. v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367.)

From the foregoing it will appear that there are three different parties who are interested in the waters of a navigable stream:

1. The United States.
2. The State in which the stream is located.
3. The riparian owner.

The interest of the United States is derived from and rests upon that paragraph of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and this power only extends to the extent of conserving the navigability of the stream. Beyond that the Federal Government has no interest or property in the stream.

The interest of the State in the stream is derived from its sovereignty and it holds its property in the stream in trust for all public uses, but in subrogation to the rights of the Federal Government as to navigation and of the riparian owner. The right to the use of the waters of a stream for any lawful purpose, outside of the right of navigation, belongs wholly to the State and the riparian owner.

Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of Elliott v. Fitchburg Railroad Company (10 Cushing, 191), describes the rights of the riparian owner in the use of water in a stream in the following language, which states the enlarged and modified common-law doctrine.

"The right to flowing water is now well settled to be a right incident to property in the land. It is a right publici juris, of such a character that whilst it is common and equal to all, through whose land it runs, and no one can obstruct or divert it, yet, as one of the beneficial gifts of Providence, each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it, as it passes through his land; and so long as it is not wholly obstructed or diverted, or no larger appropriation of the water running through it is made than a just and reasonable use, it can not be said to be wrongful or injurious to a proprietor lower down. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question, depending upon various circumstances. To take a quantity of water from a large running stream for agriculture or manufacturing purposes would cause no sensible or practicable diminution of the benefit to the prejudice of a lower proprietor, whereas taking the same quantity from a small running brook passing through many farms would be of great and manifest injury to those below, who need it for domestic supply or watering cattle, and therefore it would be an unreasonable use of the water, and an action would lie in the latter case and not in the former. It is therefore to a considerable extent a question of degree; still, the rule is the same—that each proprietor has a right to a reasonable use of it, for his own benefit, for domestic use, and for manufacturing and agricultural purposes. * * *

"That a portion of the water of a stream may be used for the purpose of irrigating land, we think is well established as one of the rights of the proprietors of the soil along or through which it passes. Yet a proprietor can not under color of that right, or for the actual purpose of irrigating his own land, wholly abstract or divert the water course, or take such an unreasonable quantity of water, or make such unreasonable use of it, as to deprive other proprietors of the substantial benefits which they might derive from it, if not diverted or used unreasonably. * * *

"This rule, that no riparian proprietor can wholly abstract or divert a water course, by which it would cease to be a running stream, or use it unreasonably in its passage, and thereby deprive a lower proprietor of a quality of his property, deemed in law incidental and beneficial, necessarily flows from the principle that the right to the reasonable and beneficial use of a running stream is common to all the riparian proprietors, and so each is bound to use his common right as not essentially to prevent or interfere with an equally beneficial enjoyment of the common right, by all the proprietors. * * *

"The right to the use of flowing water is publici juris, and common to all the riparian proprietors; it is not an absolute and exclusive right to all the water flowing past their land, so that any obstruction would give a cause of action; but it is a right to the flow and enjoyment of the water, subject to a similar right in all the proprietors to the reasonable enjoyment of the same gift of Providence. It is, therefore, only for an abstraction and deprivation of this common benefit or for an unreasonable and unauthorized use of it that an action will lie."

The doctrine of prior appropriation, already referred to, is thus described by Justice Field in the case of Jennison v. Kirk (98 U. S., 453). After describing the system of discovery and appropriation and development of mining claims, he adds the following:

"But the mines could not be worked without water. Without water the gold would remain forever buried in the earth or rock. To carry water to mining localities, when they were not on the bank of a stream or lake, became, therefore, an important and necessary business in carrying on mining. Here, also, the first appropriator of water to be conveyed to such locality for mining or other beneficial purposes was recognized as having to the extent of actual use the better right. The doctrine of the common law respecting the right of riparian owners was not considered as applicable or only in a very limited degree, to the conditions of miners in the mountains. The waters of rivers and lakes were consequently carried great distances in ditches and flumes, constructed with vast labor and enormous expenditures of money, along the sides of mountains and through canyons and ravines, to supply communities engaged in mining as well as for agriculturists and ordinary consumption. Numerous regulations were adopted, or assumed to exist, from their obvious justness, for the security of these ditches and flumes and for the protection of rights to water, not only between different appropriators, but between them and the holders of mining claims. These regulations and customs were appealed to in controversies in the State courts and received their sanction, and properties to the value of many millions rested upon them. For eighteen years—from 1848 to 1866—the regulations and customs of miners, as enforced and molded by the courts and sanctioned by the legislation of the State, constituted the law governing property in mines and in water on the public mineral lands."

These water rights by prior appropriation, as described by Justice Field, were recognized and confirmed by Congressional legislation in 1866 and in 1870. Those acts are now sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes. Justice Field further adds:

"It will thus be seen that the Federal statutes merely gave a formal sanction to the rules already established. Those rules had been built up in reliance on the tacit acquiescence of the United States, the true owner of the lands and waters on which appropriations were made, and these statutes acquiesced therein expressly 'a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right rather than the establishment of a new one.'"

In the case of Broder v. Natoma Water Company (101 U. S., 274), the Supreme Court, in referring to the contention that these statutes established a new right, uses the following language:

"We are of the opinion that it is the established doctrine of this court that rights of miners who had taken possession of mines and worked and developed them and the rights of persons who had constructed canals and ditches to be used in mining operations and for purposes of agricultural irrigation, in the region where such artificial use of the water was an absolute necessity, are rights which the Government had, by its conduct, recognized and encouraged and was bound to protect before the passage of the act of 1866, and that the section of the act which we have quoted was rather a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right of possession, constituting a valid claim to its continued use, than the establishment of a new one."

These decisions of Judge Shaw, of Massachusetts, and of Justice Field, of the Supreme Court, describe fully the rights of the riparian owners to the use of the water both under the doctrine of the common law and under the so-called "doctrine of prior appropriation," and the case of Rossmiller v. The State (114 Wis., 169), and the cases therein referred to, as well as the case of Martin et al. v. Waddell (16 Peters, 367), show the interest and property of a State in the waters of a stream.

From the foregoing statement and citation of authorities, it is evident that the only use of the waters of a stream in which the United States has any property is its use for purposes of navigation. In the use of the stream for any other purpose the Federal Government has no property, and hence has nothing to sell or to exact compensation for.

The plan proposed by the President would deprive the States and the riparian owners of their rights in the use of the water of a navigable stream now vested in them by law, and would concentrate the entire disposal and control in the Federal Government, a power which neither the States nor the riparian owners can, with justice or safety, for a moment concede. But assuming for the sake of the argument that the Federal Government can lay a tribute in such cases as is proposed by the President, it can not be under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, but must be under section 8, of article 1, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Such a tribute must be either a direct tax or in the nature of an impost or excise tax. If a direct tax, it can not be levied directly by the Federal Government, but must be apportioned among the States, leaving each State to make the collection; and if an impost or excise tax, then it must be levied by the rule of uniformity upon every dam and water power in the United States not constructed directly or indirectly by the Federal Government. In other words, there must be a general excise law on the subject. The power of the Federal Government over the navigable streams of the country is no greater in the so-called "Western" or public-land States than in the New England States. If a tribute can be levied on a dam and water power in Minnesota or Colorado, it can be levied on a dam and water power in Maine or Massachusetts, for the power of the Federal Government over navigable streams is the same in the one case as in the other. In the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (157 U. S., 557), the court states:

"Thus, in the matter of taxation, the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes, and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely, the rule of apportionment as to direct taxes and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises."

In the case of Thomas v. United States (192 U. S., 363), Chief Justice Fuller says:

"And these two classes, taxes so-called, and 'duties, imposts, and excises,' apparently embrace all forms of taxation contemplated by the Constitution. As was observed in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (157 U. S., 429, 557): 'Although there have been from time to time intimations that there might be some tax which was not a direct tax nor included under the words "duties, imposts, and excises," such a tax for more than one hundred years of national existence has as yet remained undiscovered, notwithstanding the stress of particular circumstances has invited thorough investigation into sources of revenue. * * *'

"There is no occasion to attempt to confine the words 'duties, imposts, and excises' to the limits of precise definition. We think that they were used comprehensively to cover customs and excise duties imposed on importation, consumption, manufacture and sale of certain commodities, privileges, particular business transactions, vocations, occupations, and the like."

An act authorizing the construction of a dam is, so far the United States is concerned, a mere revocable license or privilege, and if a tax can be imposed on such a privilege it must be general and uniform throughout the United States. It must apply to all dams and water powers on navigable streams throughout the entire country.

Nearly all navigable streams in their upper and more remote courses are not, as a matter of fact, navigable, and in such reaches of the river dams can be erected and water powers created under State authority and State license, and so long as such dams and water powers do not materially injure or diminish the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions the Federal Government has no ground for interference. It has been customary, however, in many of such cases to apply to Congress for a Federal license, and the granting of it, while not necessary, serves a twofold purpose—first, that it authorizes the Federal Government, through the War Department, to control and direct the construction of the dam, and, second, that it recognizes the fact, which might otherwise require proof, that the dam will not affect the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions.

(United States v. Rio Grande Company, 174 U. S., 690).

And in such cases it is of as much advantage to the United States as to the grantee of the license to have Congressional action and recognition, but in such cases the Federal Government has nothing to sell and therefore has no moral or legal ground to demand compensation in any form.

For reasons above given the committee report the bill without the amendment recommended by the War Department.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6640) authorizing appropriations for South Pass of the Mississippi River, or surveys thereon, to be used in dredging said river above the pass to secure 35 feet and suitable width, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 586) thereon.

Mr. BULKELEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4919) to correct the military record of Caleb J. Kizer, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

STANDARDS FOR MINERAL-OIL PRODUCTS.

Mr. DICK. I am directed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to report a resolution, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate as to any plans now in progress for international standards for testing mineral-oil products, and as to what legislation is advisable to secure their adoption.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LUCY FLORETTE NICHOLS.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was—

Ordered, That there be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relative to the bill (S. 5081) granting a pension to Lucy Florette Nichols, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, there having been no adverse report thereon.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] sent me word that he hopes to be able to continue his speech on Tuesday next, and if he should not be able to go on at that time he would ask me or some other Senator to read his speech for him, so that there might be no further delay about its appearance in the RECORD.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On April 28, 1908:

S. 6028. An act to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades.

On April 29, 1908:

S. 5262. An act to repeal an act approved April 30, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes," and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up House bill 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that it may be read for action on amendments, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 1, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand," so as to read:

One solicitor, $4,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "thousand," in line 12, the words "five hundred."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend the committee amendment in line 12, by inserting after the words "four thousand" the words "five hundred," so as to read:

One solicitor, $4,500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 2, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "and $500 additional as custodian of buildings," so as to read:

Chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings.

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know (it is difficult to tell because the noise in the Chamber is so great), what method is being pursued in reading the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I asked that the usual method might be pursued, dispensing with the formal reading of the bill, but reading the bill for amendments and acting first upon the committee amendments.

Mr. TELLER. There are amendments here that I do not want to be agreed to informally. I do not know that I object to the reading of the bill in that way, with the understanding that we can go back to the amendments and object to them and offer amendments to them as if they had not been adopted.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes it, of course I shall not object to having the bill read formally. All these matters will remain unsettled during consideration of the bill. I assume that naturally they will be open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to wait until they are open to amendment in the Senate. I think I understand what the rule is. Here is a bill carrying a large amount of money. I am not half so much concerned about the money as I am about the establishment of certain principles sought to be established in the bill. I desire to have the bill read and to have it open to amendment and to objection.

It has been the custom to read the bill and adopt the amendments that come from the committee unless there is objection to them. That is the way the appropriation bills are generally read here, and it is impossible for a Senator, unless he is on the qui vive all the time, to prevent the Chair from declaring an amendment adopted, and there is no opportunity for a Senator to be heard.

Mr. President, the bill should be read in an orderly manner. I think the text of the bill ought to be read. I do not believe in the clerks skipping from one page to another and from one amendment to another. It may be that it will take some little time to do it, but our experience here, I think, will justify me in saying that we ought to read these bills with more care, and the Senate ought to give more attention to the character of these appropriations than they have been in the habit of doing.

Mr. President, the bill can be read as I think it ought to be read, and I am going to attempt to make some objections when I have an opportunity. I do not intend that all the amendments shall be adopted pro forma and then be told that I may have the privilege, when the bill gets into the Senate, of attacking them. I am going to attack them while the bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, as I understand it, under the request he has made the bill will be carefully read, every word of it, and the amendments of the committee, as we come to them, will be agreed to or disagreed to, and they will be open, of course, for discussion. Now, in view of that, does the Senator wish to go through a formal reading of the bill and then have it read the second time?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator is correct and the bill is to be read, every word of it, it will be an innovation in the method of reading appropriation bills. But if that can be done I will take my chances on following the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that it may be so read. Of course it may be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill in accordance with the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. TELLER. The bill is to be read, every line of it is to be read, and every word of it is to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the rule. The Secretary will conform to it. The Secretary will begin at the beginning of the bill.

The Secretary again proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 1, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand," so as to read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; one solicitor, $4,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offered an amendment to the amendment when it was read before, and I understand that it was adopted. If I am incorrect about that I desire to offer it again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah can again move his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On line 12, after the words "four thousand," I move to insert the words "five hundred," so as to read:

One solicitor, $4,500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 2, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "and $500 addition as custodian of buildings," so as to read:

Chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings.

The next amendment was, in the item for the office of the secretary, on page 2, line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert "one assistant engineer, $1,400," and in line 20, before the word "assistant," to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to read:

One chief engineer, who shall be captain of the watch, $1,600; one assistant engineer, $1,400; two assistant engineers at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for the office of the Secretary, on page 3, line 18, before the word "emergency," to strike out the comma and insert "and," and in the same line, after the word "employments," to strike out "and pay of rents," so as to read:

Five charwomen, at $240 each; for extra laborers and emergency employments, $7,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, to increase the total appropriation for the office of the Secretary of Agriculture from $131,500 to $132,900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from Wyoming. Should not the total be changed, $500 having been added by the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Secretary may correct the totals whenever changes should be made as we go along with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 6, line 5, after the word "Bermuda," to insert "not to exceed $2,000, to be immediately available for the pay of observers and other employees engaged in evaporation investigations," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, station employees, Weather Bureau: Professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, skilled mechanics, repairmen, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, for duty in the District of Columbia or elsewhere in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, not to exceed $2,000, to be immediately available for the pay of observers and other employees engaged in evaporation investigations, $586,750.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the item in italics, in lines 5, 6, and 7, be disagreed to. I shall offer it in another form.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. For the committee I offer the following amendment. On page 6, at the end of line 8, after the word "dollars," I move to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

Of which sum not to exceed $2,000 shall be immediately available for the pay of observers and other employees engaged in evaporation investigations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand that the Senator proposes to drop out the item in lines 5, 6, and 7?

Mr. WARREN. It is proposed in a different form so as to pass the Auditor, who has some doubt about the form in which it was first presented. It is merely a change, cutting out the amendment and adding another in place of it.

Mr. TELLER. As I understood the Secretary to read it, it would be left in. I do not know whether that is correct or not.

Mr. WARREN. Let the Secretary read from line 4 as it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, beginning with line 4, the bill reads:

In the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, $586,750, of which sum not to exceed $2,000 shall be immediately available for the pay of observers and other employees engaged in evaporation investigations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 6, line 11, before the word "equipment," to insert "establishment," so as to read:

General expenses, Weather Bureau: Every expenditure requisite for and incident to the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of meteorological observation stations in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, and in Bermuda.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for general expenses, Weather Bureau, on page 7, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "one hundred and twenty;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out the period and the word "For" and insert a semicolon and "for"; and in line 15, after the word "climatology," to insert "and evaporation, including the erection of temporary buildings for living quarters for observers engaged in evaporation work;" and in line 19, after the word "crop," to strike out "evaporation," so as to read:

For the acquisition of sites and the erection of buildings for the use of the Weather Bureau, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses, plans, and specifications to be prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, not to exceed $120,000; for the reestablishment of the Weather Bureau Station at Pikes Peak, Colorado, not to exceed $5,000; for rents of offices; for official traveling expenses; for freight and express charges; for telegraphing, telephoning, or cabling reports and messages, rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture by agreement with the companies performing the service; for maintenance and repair of Weather Bureau telegraph, telephone, and cable lines; for investigations on climatology and evaporation, including the erection of temporary buildings for living quarters for observers engaged in evaporation work; for river, rain, snow, ice, crop, and aerial observations and reports.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for general expenses, Weather Bureau, on page 7, line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "thirty," so as to read:

For storm, hurricane, and other observations, warnings, and reports; including pay of special observers and display men, none of whom shall receive more than $25 per month; and including not to exceed $30,000 for the maintenance of a printing office in the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, after the word "necessary," to insert "not to exceed $10,000 to be immediately available for evaporation investigations," so as to read:

Including the purchase of necessary supplies and materials for printing weather maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, monthly reviews, and other publications, and for pay of assistant foremen, proof readers, compositors, pressmen, lithographers, and folders and feeders, when necessary; not to exceed $10,000 to be immediately available for evaporation investigations.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that this amendment, the two lines in italics, be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I have another amendment to offer in its place. Possibly I should offer the amendment which is to take the place of it before the Senator proceeds.

Mr. TELLER. I wanted to make an inquiry of the acting chairman of the committee. It is whether the Department of Agriculture is maintaining a publication office which is engaged in printing as well as the general Government Printing Office?

Mr. WARREN. It does for the printing of maps, charts, and plats that are particularly applicable to Weather Bureau business, the same as the War Department does in the printing of certain forms, orders, etc.

Mr. TELLER. What is the amendment the Senator offers?

Mr. WARREN. I will ask that the amendment may be read and then it will be before the Senate. It is simply to change the form so as to pass the Auditor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 8, strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words:

Of which sum not to exceed $10,000 shall be immediately available for evaporation investigations.

Mr. WARREN. That is the same matter that we had up before, and it is only to provide that it may be audited exactly as we intend it should be. It makes that much of the amount immediately available for immediate use, and only that much.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 10, to increase the total for Weather Bureau from $1,602,260 to $1,677,260.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was called out of the Chamber when the amendments on pages 6 and 7 were adopted. I notice that the word "establishment," in line 10, on page 6, was added, and the appropriation on page 7 is increased from $45,000 to $120,000.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that there is no connection whatever between the two. The matter is this: The establishment of a weather station does not carry with it, necessarily, the building, or the erection of a building, but there are one or two points where it is desired to establish stations of the Weather Bureau. The provision on page 7 is to provide for certain buildings in certain places to be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture. Those already built cost $15,000 apiece. On the House side, on points of order, some six or eight—I have forgotten how many—put in by name, were stricken out, and the amount was cut down to $45,000. The Senate committee has raised it to $120,000, which will provide for as many stations as 15,000 will be contained in 120,000—that is, eight stations, instead of three. In other words, the amendment on page 7 permits them to build eight stations instead of three.

The word "establishment," on the other page, means an entirely different thing—that is, that they may establish a weather station at one or two points where they desire to do so. They are not yet established.

Mr. TELLER. Where will they be established?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I have the names of the proposed points here, but they have the authority to establish stations under existing law. It has always been in the legislation heretofore. It was dropped out of this bill by error, and we wish to correct it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming where is the item of increased expense for the establishment of new stations if the item on page 7 has no application to it?

Mr. WARREN. The amendment on page 8, I will say to the Senator, raises the total amount from $792,000 to $867,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. The total increase being how much?

Mr. WARREN. Seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. CULBERSON. Are we to understand that the $75,000 is for the establishment of new stations?

Mr. WARREN. Seventy-five thousand dollars is the addition, so that they may have a sufficient sum to erect the eight stations they expect to build. The establishment of new stations is provided for, so far as money is concerned, under the main appropriation or lump sum for the Bureau. It does not cost a great deal of money, but the word "establishment," which by error was left out, should be there in order to establish them.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was going to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question regarding these stations. The bill provides, as I understand, a lump sum.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For the establishment of stations and the erection of buildings?

Mr. WARREN. There are two different things. The establishment of a station is not necessarily connected with the erection of a building.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is there an item providing for the erection of buildings?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; the item of $120,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does that cover the number of the buildings that were provided in the bill passed by the House?

Mr. WARREN. It covers one more than the number provided in the original House bill and five more than were in the bill as it came to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And leaves the location in the discretion of the Department?

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so.

Mr. TELLER. It occurs to me from reading the bill that none of these establishments are in the United States. Is that the idea?

Mr. WARREN. The idea is to establish them in the United States, but temporary or hurricane stations may be established in the West Indies or at other points where they have been in the habit of establishing them, or where such stations may be deemed necessary.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is correct. You give the Department the option?

Mr. WARREN. They always have had it.

Mr. TELLER. How many Weather Bureau establishments have we outside of the United States?

Mr. WARREN. I am unable to state without referring to the report from the Weather Bureau. The Senator can find that in the report of the Weather Bureau. I will undertake to get it later.

Mr. TELLER. I shall have to go without that information then.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that it is rather hard for one man to carry in his mind all the stations in the United States and all the countries outside where we have stations of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. TELLER. The man has never lived who can keep up with the Agriculture Department and the Weather Bureau and the Forest Reserve Service so as to have any idea as to what is going on. I think it would take half a dozen men to do that if each man devoted his time to a part of the subject. I did not think the acting chairman ought to be able to give me the information as to what this Department or this Bureau is doing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 10, line 23, after the word "necessary," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided also, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend not to exceed $5,000 of the amount hereby appropriated to especially investigate hemorrhagic septicæmia, infectious cerebro-spinal meningitis, and malignant catarrh, prevalent among domestic animals in the State of Minnesota and adjoining States, to work out, if possible, in cooperation with the Minnesota Experiment Station, the problem of prevention by developing antitoxin or preventive vaccines and to secure and diffuse information along these lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 14, line 17, after the word "methods," to strike out "to combat" and insert "of meeting the ravages of;" and in line 18, after the word "weevil," to insert "not to exceed $10,000, to be immediately available," so as to read:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry: To investigate fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drug, medicinal, poisonous, fiber, and other plants and plant industries, in cooperation with other branches of the Department, the State experiment stations, and practical farmers; to continue the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, not to exceed $10,000, to be immediately available; to study plant and orchard diseases and demonstrate the treatment of same, etc.

Mr. MONEY. I want now to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the fact that at this point the bill is incorrectly printed.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to move a disagreement to that amendment, and to move to insert it in a different form in another place.

Mr. MONEY. Why not correct the phraseology right here, where it ought to be corrected, if the Senator will allow me? Why not allow the Secretary to now correctly report the amendment. The committee simply concluded the consideration of the bill at the meeting on last Saturday; it did not have time to get the disjecta membra together, and when it was put together for the printer it was incorrectly phrased. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as I have prepared it, which I think makes it exactly right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. MONEY. The provision will be correct as I propose to amend it.

The SECRETARY. After the words "boll weevil," on page 14, line 18, it is proposed to strike out the words "not to exceed;" and after the word "dollars," in line 19, to insert the words "of which shall," so as to read:

"Ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $10,000, of which shall be immediately available.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to have read the words which I propose to have inserted?

Mr. MONEY. That is incorrect. I did not wish my amendment to read in the way it has been stated from the desk.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow to be read an amendment which has been prepared by the Department, and submitted to its legal authority, so as to put this matter in proper shape?

Mr. MONEY. My amendment has not been framed in the way I directed it to be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. I will say that, if this amendment should be adopted, we strike out the one that was put in here on lines 18 and 19, and this goes in in another place.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to have the Secretary read it now.

Mr. WARREN. That is the second amendment there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. TELLER. Is it on page 18?

Mr. WARREN. That is where we insert it, at the end of the paragraph.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 15, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out the period, to insert a comma, and the following words, "of which sum not to exceed $10,000 shall be immediately available for cotton boll weevil work."

Mr. MONEY. No; that is not correct. What the committee adopted was the sum of $300,000 for that work, of which sum ten thousand was made immediately available for work in Oklahoma. We put that in at the instance of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] will recollect, and we agreed to it.

Mr. WARREN. That is precisely what this amendment does. We decided then that we would not insert the name Oklahoma upon the assurance of the Secretary of Agriculture, who was present, that this money should be exclusively used there for that particular purpose.

Mr. MONEY. That is the understanding?

Mr. WARREN. The idea is to have this qualifying clause come in after the appropriation, rather than before it. That is the reason of the correction which I now offer; and this correction will meet the view of the Senator from Mississippi entirely. It will be, that out of the $300,000 the sum of $10,000 shall be immediately available for this work in Oklahoma.

Mr. MONEY. That is all the Senator from Oklahoma wanted.

Mr. TELLER. As I understand, lines 17 and 18, on page 14, are to be amended.

Mr. WARREN. The second amendment will be stricken out, on lines 18 and 19, and the amendment on lines 17 and 18 will be agreed to, because it is a mere change of language. Instead of having it read "to combat," as it came from the House, we put it, "of meeting the ravages of."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 17, after the word "methods," it is proposed to strike out the words "to combat" and to insert the words "of meeting the ravages of," so as to read: "To continue the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil," and to disagree to the committee amendment after the words "boll weevil," in line 18, inserting the words "not to exceed $10,000, to be immediately available."

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the first amendment of the committee, on page 14, lines 17 and 18, will be agreed to and the second amendment, in lines 18 and 19, will be rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 15, line 8, before the word "water," to insert "farm," so as to read:

To study and find methods for preventing algal and other contaminations of farm water supplies; to carry on special investigations of the conditions of grain production, handling, grading, and transit, and of the means of improving the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 25, after the word "grades," to insert "such grades when so fixed to become the official standards for the grading of grain," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain, at such points as he may deem expedient, laboratories for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the nature, quality, and condition of any sample, parcel, or consignment of seed or grain, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to report upon such samples, parcels, or consignments, from time to time, and the reports so made shall serve as a basis for the fixing of definite grades, such grades when so fixed to become the official standards for the grading of grain, and also for the issuance of certificates of inspection when requested by the consignor or consignee of any grain entering into foreign commerce.

Mr. NELSON. I make the point of order against that paragraph that it is general legislation. It is general legislation of the most flagrant character. It provides for the establishment of official grades of grain by the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BURKETT. I hope the Senator will withhold his point of order for just a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I will withhold it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BURKETT. I doubt, Mr. President, if that amendment is subject to the point of order if taken in connection with the previous part of this section, and I do not believe that the Senator will care to have it go out if he understands the limitations of what it is calculated to do. I will say to the Senator that, as the section already provides, the Government does now have a certain number of these laboratories for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the nature, the quality, and the conditions of the samples of grain that are sent in. After they have done that they are through; they have done all the work, and yet have not announced the result. The object of these words is to enable the Department to declare what is an official standard for the grading of grain.

I want to say to the Senator that the amendment does not contemplate general grain inspection, as is contemplated by another bill—a general inspection bill—that is pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The only object of this amendment is, after they have made this inspection in these laboratories, as the law now provides, that they shall promulgate that as the standard of grain. I trust the Senator will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] I desire to say that there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon which many hearings have been had, and the general question of national grain grading and inspection has been gone into very thoroughly. That bill is complete in itself. It not only grants power to the Secretary of Agriculture to inspect and grade grain, but puts the machinery into his hands for doing that business. The House committee and the Senate committee combined seem to have made an attempt to reach part way along this line by this character of amendment.

I do not see that anything possible can be gained by the amendment, even if it were a lawful amendment. It simply provides that the Secretary may designate certain grades as national grades, but it goes no further than that. It does not fix the grading of grain generally; it gives the Secretary of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture the control over none of the grain grading at all; but simply provides that he may take a sample which he may examine, and he will call that sample which he examines "the United States standard" and give it a certain grade without any provision for reaching the grain back in the interior of the country or of enforcing that grade in any of the great grain markets of the United States.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I submit that it does more than that and that the good effect of it is more than suggested. The Senator from North Dakota has introduced a bill, as he suggests, and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have had a good many hearings on that bill. We have spent several days very recently in hearings on that bill. That bill, though, goes a good deal further than this amendment proposes. That bill provides for a system of inspectors by which all the grain in the great central markets shall be inspected by a Government inspector. This amendment does not add an inspector or a dollar of cost to the work that the Government is already doing.

One of the difficulties that developed in the hearing of the Senator's bill was that we were being handicapped in foreign markets by the fact that when grain of a certain grade was sold and shipped to Europe it did not mean much of anything, and the buyer could not rely on the grading. For instance, the grain might be sold as No. 2 wheat or No. 2 corn, but that does not mean anything particularly, because there is no universal standard in America. Minneapolis has its own standard; Illinois may have a standard; each grain center may have a standard. In some places it is controlled by State regulation, and in some places there is no regulation whatsoever. The difficulty is that when grain is shipped abroad and is bought as grain of a certain number, the buyer can not tell what he is going to get because, as I have said, there is no established standard in America.

The Agricultural Department has investigated this matter very thoroughly. I have here a report setting forth some of the conditions that handicap our exportation. One of our foreign consuls goes so far as to say that where we used to ship practically all the corn, to-day our competitors are shipping 80 per cent of it, which has been brought about because there is no standard in the United States and they can not tell what they are buying.

The object of this amendment, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, is not to go so far as the bill which he has introduced and which he is championing—and, by the way, if we could get that as a law it would be much better even than this—but this simply provides that when these laboratories at Baltimore and New York and Minneapolis and at several other places—six or seven, I think, where the Government now has such laboratories—have inspected this grain and determined what the standard shall be, then that shall be announced as the United States standard, just the same as 3 feet constitute a yard, or so many feet a mile.

We passed a law here the other day providing, in the District of Columbia, how many cubic feet there must be in a cord of wood. That did not hurt or harm anybody, but it made a basis on which people could sell and buy wood and always know how many cubic feet they were getting for a cord. That is all, I submit to the Senator from North Dakota, that this amendment will do.

That is all it is intended to do. It does not add a penny of expense to the Government, but it does establish a standard of grain. It fixes how much of moisture a bushel of wheat or a bushel of corn may have in it, beyond which it must not have, to be No. 2 or No. 3, or whatever the case may be; how much of dirt; how much of cracked grains; how much of foreign substances; in short, it says how much of such matter a bushel of No. 2 wheat or No. 2 corn, or No. 3 corn, may have after this inspection has been made, and makes that the standard; so that when we export it foreign buyers can tell just exactly what they should get. It will be a great help, as the Secretary of Agriculture has demonstrated in this report—and I have not time to read it, and do not want to take the time of the Senate to do so—but the adoption of the amendment will help in our foreign markets.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what would be the result where a State has a standard? Some of the States certainly have standards of grain.

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; there are some, I think. I have a list here. Illinois and Missouri and Minnesota, and perhaps one or two others, have State inspection.

Mr. TELLER. The Dakotas, I think, have.

Mr. BURKETT. Of course this would not affect anybody. You could not make anybody conform to this standard. If the Senator wished to buy grain on some other standard than the Government standard, he could buy it on the Minneapolis standard or any other standard that he wanted to buy it; but the thing is to have a standard by which a foreign buyer can buy "United States standard No. 2" and will know what he has a right to expect. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose the United States standard and the State standards differ, what would happen then?

Mr. BURKETT. There would not anything happen.

Mr. TELLER. Would it not affect the right of a State to have its general standard?

Mr. BURKETT. It does not affect the right of a State in the slightest. It has nothing to do with the right of a State.

Mr. TELLER. Possibly it would not; but I am surprised that there is not something of that kind in the bill, so that the States shall not fix the standard. It certainly will be an anomaly to have the State make one standard and the General Government another. I suppose the friends of this measure expect to force the States to accept the national standard, whatever that may be.

Mr. BURKETT. They would necessarily do it.

Mr. TELLER. It is a matter which, it seems to me, belongs to the States, and I think the grain-growing States can take care of it.

Mr. BURKETT. The facts are, I will say to the Senator, that the Secretary of Agriculture reports here that there is that difficulty which has grown out of this. They have not been able to take care of it. For instance, a purchaser in a foreign market buys a million bushels of No. 2 corn. There is now no standard. It may be No. 2 by one market, by one standard, and not No. 2 by another. This is to make a standard, so that when wheat or corn is sold abroad for No. 2, Government standard, the shipper will know exactly what he has to furnish, and the man at the other end will know what he is to receive, and there will not be this conflict.

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose any foreign purchaser will be obliged to take either standard, either State or national. What the standard is will be determined where they sell the goods in Europe, or wherever it may be.

Mr. BURKETT. The result is that not knowing what standard applies when they buy No. 2, they do not know what they will get, and that fact has affected our sales abroad, and that is the object of making a uniform standard.

I will not quote, but I will say that in this report the Secretary of Agriculture speaks of the fact that the method of selling grain on certificate, both in domestic and foreign trade, is extremely desirable. Now, as a matter of fact, this thing his gone so far and to such limits that grain can not be sold on certificates, and it must be sold on samples, and moreover, as one consul reports, where grain has gone from here over there, and by something occurring on the route has been damaged, the purchaser insists on testing it after it reaches the foreign destination, to the detriment of the shipper.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator suppose that any man who imports grain which is injured on the road is going to accept the certificate made before the grain started? Of course it will depend upon what the condition of the grain is when it reaches there, and no certificate given by the shipper can bind the man who is to receive the grain.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the discussion on this point should not proceed too long, and, although I have no desire to cut it off, I hope we will not go into the question of the grain inspection hearings and all the arguments which for some months we have been considering. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will condense the discussion as much as possible.

Mr. BURKETT. I have tried to avoid going into the general-inspection scheme. I have endeavored to show the Senate, and especially the Senator from North Dakota, that this is not a general inspection scheme. It is only to take what is already established and to say, when that is done, it shall be the standard.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish first to answer the objections of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and to say that if this did establish a Federal inspection, there would be no State inspection certificates which would be accepted anywhere for the exportation of grain, because the foreign demand is universal for such a certificate as they can depend upon. I say frankly that nearly all the grain shipped from the United States to-day to foreign ports does not measure up to the standard fixed by even the State inspection, and there is no confidence in foreign markets in certification from the United States.

If this was effective, it might have some such result as is hoped for by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT], but he will find upon reading it that it does not fix any standard for anything except the samples which the Secretary of Agriculture may examine. I call his attention to the wording of the paragraph. It says:

> And the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to report upon such samples, parcels, or consignments from time to time—

Report to whom? Simply to "report upon." In other words, he reports to himself upon them. He makes examinations of the grain in his laboratory here and elsewhere in the country and determines the character of the grain, and he reports. To whom? To nobody who can enforce his recommendations.

> And the reports so made shall serve as a basis for the fixing of definite grades.

Reports made on what and to whom? Reports made upon samples and made to himself. He fixes the grade, then, of these samples which he examines through his laboratories. How does he enforce them? There is no method whatever of enforcing them. The provision that is added here does not even affect the following provision, which is—

> And also for the issuance of certificates of inspection when requested by the consignor or consignee of any grain entering into foreign commerce.

If what the Senator desires is that we shall have United States grades for the grain that is exported, then the bill ought to say that the certificates shall be based upon United States grades, which shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture; and if that were done, there is not a single foreign buyer, as we could easily show to the Senator from Colorado if we could get before him the results of the investigations, who would buy anything but the United States grades.

I want to say further to the Senator from Colorado that under our present system all the exports of grain are made upon certificates on this side of the ocean, and the purchaser is compelled to accept the certificate or the certification of the grain before it enters into transit. Therefore he has absolutely no remedy if there is any kind of fraud perpetrated upon him or if the grain does not measure up to the standard of certification.

So I agree with the Senator that at least the provision of this amendment does not in any way assist the Secretary of Agriculture in making a standard for the export of grain.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand under this provision the Secretary would take a sample of grain, and he would determine how much moisture there was in it, and what should be the amount in it; and when he found that he could say that that was the standard, and everybody would have to conform to it. If a man wanted to ship a shipload of corn or wheat to Europe, he would be required to furnish it up to that standard. If it did not come up to that standard, of course the purchasers would have their remedy against him. If they thought it was up to the proper standard, they would buy it. I presume likely it would supersede the State authority. Undoubtedly it would.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would undoubtedly in time supersede both the State authority and the authority of the several boards of trade.

The way the Secretary of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture would arrive at a standard is this: They would take grains from any of the sections of the country. We will say there are eight great species of grain raised. We will take our Northern grain, for instance, and if he wishes to have a No. 2 Northern United States grade, the Secretary will say what the weight must be per bushel, the coloring, and the amount of moisture, and the species of grain that enter into it, and determine that that shall be No. 2, and something else shall be No. 3. The foreign purchaser would purchase upon that certificate, in which he would have confidence.

But without taking any more time, I insist that the amendment, as it is inserted here, will not certify a United States grade upon the export from this country, and without further machinery for carrying it into effect I can not imagine how it can be enforced or made effective.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate for more than a moment. We have in the different grain States grades of grain and inspection of grain. The effect of this amendment would be to create a national official grade of grain. It is an innovation and an entire change of our system, and to that extent it is general legislation and ought to go out of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment proposes general legislation, and is therefore in contravention of the provision of Rule XVI. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] made a very pertinent inquiry a short time since, but I did not then have the information. I now have it. A moment after making my statement I knew I had been in error about our having permanent stations in foreign lands as such. We collaborate with other governments and work with them. We also have stations in our possessions outside of the United States proper. With its permission, where a foreign government has not a station of its own we can establish one.

I understand that the present plan is to establish one, perhaps, in Bermuda for the purpose indicated, and one or more on the Southern coast. The stations we now have are 206 in the United States proper, also one at Honolulu, and one at San Juan, Porto Rico. We also have one at Turks Island.

I desire the attention of the Senate for a moment to something that comes in properly at this point. We are on line 4, page 18?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. WARREN. I have received here at my desk, since calling up this bill, a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, bearing date to-day, April 30, to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and also a copy of a letter from that Senator to the Secretary, of date yesterday, accompanied by an exhibit of screenings, and so forth, showing the great percentage of weed seed in the grain seed. The Secretary submits to the committee two amendments, one very short and the other one of considerable length. They are alternative, and it will require the adoption of but one. Since they comprehend legislation, I want to ask that the letters and the amendments be printed in the RECORD, so that Senators may look at them before we shall consider the question. I have no doubt we shall be compelled to go into another day before we finish the bill, and I will ask to take up the matter when we next have the bill up, to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

APRIL 29, 1908.

Hon. JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am in receipt of a letter from a friend at Port Arthur, Ontario, in which he says:

"Under separate cover I am sending you sample of screenings which may interest you. These foul seeds are being shipped from here to the United States by car and boat loads. It strikes me as being rather strange that this vicious stuff can be dumped into your country while the laws of the western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta compel destruction by burning at interior cleaning elevators. Reshipment from terminal elevators to these provinces is absolutely prohibited. Some time ago a shipment was made to the eastern part of this province. It raised such a furore that the traffic is likely to receive a rude shock by drastic legislation. Don't believe I am overestimating when I say that fully 10,000 tons will have been shipped from Canadian head of the Lakes to the United States during twelve months when a consignment of about 3,000 tons awaiting shipment on the opening of navigation is included. As you are probably aware, this stuff goes into your country under an ad valorem of 10 per cent, and costs here from $6 to $7 per ton, though somewhat higher prices were paid for the output of one elevator last fall. Bulk of shipments here by boat have gone to Chicago and Duluth; by rail to Minneapolis and St. Paul, to be reshipped to feed lots in Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, and other States.

"As you know, there has been an immense amount of feed wheat in this country this year, and from prices paid for screenings (?) I am inclined to the belief that not a little of it has found its way to Minneapolis and St. Paul, though I can not speak positively as to this nor cite specific instances. But the viciousness of the traffic I know will interest you, aside from the possibility of its being an avenue through which other grains reach your market under 10 per cent clause."

I am sending you samples of screenings referred to by my correspondent, and I shall be glad if you will have the matter inquired into and advise me if in your opinion anything can be done to prevent the evil complained of.

Sincerely, yours, H. C. HANSBROUGH.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1908.

Hon. H. C. HANSBROUGH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HANSBROUGH: I am in receipt of your letter of April 29, with the sample of screenings referred to by your correspondent from Port Arthur, Ontario.

We agree fully with what your correspondent says, and believe that material of this kind should be excluded from entry into the United States. Our agricultural lands are rapidly becoming fouled with dangerous weeds introduced in this way. This particular situation seems to be especially urgent, and I believe some steps ought to be taken to prevent the further introduction of material of this kind. I am inclosing herewith two proposed paragraphs, either of which I think would serve the purpose.

The sample submitted contains 81 per cent of weed seeds, made up of thirty-one different kinds, including Canada thistle. Only 7 per cent of the material is grain, 22 per cent being dirt.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

[Inclosure.]

Insert page 18, after word "commerce," line 4:

"Provided, That screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seeds shall be refused admittance into the United States."

Insert page 18, after word "commerce," line 4:

"Provided, That it shall be unlawful to import from any foreign country into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seed; and any person who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any foreign country, or having so received shall deliver for pay or otherwise to any other person any imported screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seed shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense shall be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense and for each subsequent offense not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture shall make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out this provision."

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if those two letters or recommendations are so long that they can not properly be read at this time? I desire to say that so many efforts have been made to crowd in something that shall take the place of or put off a bill for national grain grading that I am suspicious of many of these little items that propose to go halfway or a quarter of the way or a little ways in the matter of securing that which the people of my section of the country are demanding in whole. I should like to know what those letters are, what they seek to procure, and what amendments, if any, are proposed.

Mr. WARREN. As I looked them over hurriedly, they seemed to refer entirely to weed seed. They are of some length. However, I have no objection to their being read now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell me what are the proposed amendments? I understand amendments are proposed, one very short and the other quite long. I wish the Secretary would at least read those.

Mr. WARREN. They are in the alternative.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after the word "commerce," in line 4, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seeds shall be refused admittance into the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. All grain, I understand, is subject to the tariff law, and I can not understand how we in the Senate can take up a matter that relates entirely to the raising of revenue and prohibit an importation that would affect our revenue.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of this bill understands the character of the amendment suggested, and for that reason wanted to put it in the broadest terms before the Senate for its action. It is an important matter and, on the other hand, it is a broad step in legislation. If the Senator desires the whole matter read, I have no objection, and will ask for it.

Mr. McCUMBER, I wish simply——

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary might read the other amendment, however.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator right here, upon that amendment, if in his opinion I am not right in the proposition that a subject of that character should originate in the House, because it must necessarily affect our tariff schedules upon grain?

Mr. WARREN. I suppose this is a class of legislation like that which the Senator and others have strongly advocated here—the oleomargarine bill, the pure-food bill, and so forth. It is a matter for the Senate to determine. As I have said, this communication has just reached me. It is not fifteen minutes since I received it, and I have not read the other amendment which the Senator asked to have read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want the Senator to understand that I am opposed to it, provided we can reach this, because I am opposed to any wheat coming in without a heavy duty.

Mr. WARREN. Let the other amendment be read; or if the Senator desires it, let the letters be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 18, after the word "commerce," in line 4:

Provided, That it shall be unlawful to import from any foreign country into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seed, and any person who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any foreign country, or having so received shall deliver for pay or otherwise to any other person any imported screenings or grain containing more than 10 per cent of weed seed shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and for such offense shall be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense and for each subsequent offense not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture shall make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out this provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. The provision, I will say to the Senator, may be eminently proper and undoubtedly is. I am not prepared to pass on that.

Mr. WARREN. I have only this to-day, Mr. President. It seemed to me, in the glance I had the time to give it, to be along the line of the pure-food bill and others. In this case it seeks to purify the grains that shall come in, to the end that we shall not be distributing through our agricultural districts all kinds of noxious weeds.

I want to have the matter considered in the broadest terms, and therefore I desire to have printed in the RECORD, and I hope every Senator will carefully consider it, the communication from the Secretary, together with the proposed amendments. I think the object aimed at is most excellent. I shall ask to take it up at a later time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose the object is to prevent the importation of foul seeds into this country.

Mr. WARREN. That is it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 18, line 14, to increase the appropriation for official traveling expenses, for telegraph and telephone service, for gas and electric current, for forage, ice, postage, etc., from $896,266 to $906,266.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Right at this point comes the cotton boll weevil amendment, which was sent to the desk some time ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 15, on page 18, it is proposed to insert:

Of which sum not to exceed $10,000 shall be immediately available for cotton boll weevil work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 18, line 21, before the word "traveling," to insert "official," and on page 19, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "fifty-eight," so as to read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, and electric current, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for rent and repairs; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $258,000, of which amount not less than $202,000 shall be allotted for Congressional distribution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to the end of line 14 on page 20.

Mr. TELLER. I do not quite understand this clause. It says:

That all seeds, bulbs, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the Department.

The 1st day of April has passed. Will we be cut off from having any seeds——

Mr. WARREN. That is intended to apply to the 1st day of April following I understand. In this case it would be the 1st day of April of next year.

Mr. TELLER. I want my seeds this year, not next year.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose the Senator did not call for them at all, and the 1st day of next April should come; then this provision would become operative.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me rather a remarkable way of treating the subject.

Mr. WARREN. It is the present law. I think the Senator will find no difficulty about it.

Mr. TELLER. I think the language might have been improved.

Mr. WARREN. It is the language of the present law.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 12, on page 20.

Mr. WARREN. My attention has been called to line 12, page 20. After the word "propagation" there should be a comma.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a comma after the word "propagation" in line 12, on page 20.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I should like to call attention, although it is a small matter, to the propriety of the insertion of a comma at this place. I think the Senator is wrong about it. I think it is right as it is. A comma never precedes a conjunctive——

Mr. WARREN. It was in the House bill, and we have not offered any amendment to the text, and so I proposed that we should restore what the House had. It is not an important matter.

Mr. BACON. According to every known rule, the comma——

Mr. WARREN. I have yielded so many times that if the Senator from Georgia insists upon it I will gladly yield the comma.

Mr. BACON. I simply suggest it to the Senator. I would not wish to take the responsibility of doing more than that, and then leave him to be governed by what he may conclude to be correct. But I do not think there is any doubt about the question from a grammatical standpoint, that a comma ought not to be there. A comma never precedes the word "and."

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I do not entirely agree with him that a comma never precedes the word "and," but I will defer entirely to him as to the language in this case. It was in the House bill and in the existing law, but it has run along that way from year to year, and I thought as long as they had been able to administer these affairs under the law and the House had adhered to the same thing we should let it go that way.

Mr. BACON. I think the bill as it stands is undoubtedly correct in that regard. A comma precedes "or," but it does not precede "and."

Mr. WARREN. It might in some cases, and in others it might not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming wish the amendment to stand?

Mr. WARREN. It is probably necessary to do one thing or the other, either to move to amend the bill by striking out the comma or else to insert it and make it conform. I will put it the other way and move that the comma which is in the bill be omitted.

Mr. BACON. I ought to say to the Senator in order that I may not be misunderstood, that there are certain circumstances, as has been called to my attention by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], where a comma does precede "and," in the twenty-first line, for instance——

Mr. WARREN. Senators on both sides have undertaken to instruct me on the point of a comma, and, inasmuch as I was never so brought up and my education does not lie in that direction——

Mr. BACON. It does properly precede in the twenty-first line, but that is not where there is a conjunction between two nouns.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the comma after the word "propagation" in line 12.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 21, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-six" and insert "fifty-six," so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That $56,000 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experiments with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country; and the seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants thus collected, purchased, tested, and propagated shall not be included in general distribution, but shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Plant Industry from $1,331,676 to $1,351,676.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps we had better read the provisions with respect to the Forest Service, and then I shall ask to lay them over. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is very much interested in this matter, and he is too ill to take up the subject to-day. So I wish to ask that after the reading this matter be laid aside, and upon finishing the remainder of the bill I shall ask that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. This part of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. This part of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendments go over.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; the entire matter of the Forest Service may go over. I think it is well to read it now.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wyoming does not wish to have the amendments bearing on the Forest Service acted on at present.

Mr. WARREN. In one particular I shall move to amend. There are one or two amendments where the House language was sought to be followed, but where the record shows that one word or two words were stricken out. In one case two lines have been dropped out. I shall want to restore those. It is not my intention to correct these amendments or to adopt any of them as to the Forest Service at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be passed over. The Secretary will read the text of the bill.

The Secretary read the text of the bill to line 23, page 25.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming explain the amendment on page 24?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but I will say to the Senator that I had requested that all the items relating to the Forest Service, including that amendment, go over unacted upon until a later period.

MARY EDDY DRIGGS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, when the bill (S. 6715) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war and other wars and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors was under consideration in the Senate yesterday afternoon I was in the Committee on Military Affairs, sitting as a member of the conference on the Army appropriation bill. There was an item in the pension bill in which I had some interest, and with which I was familiar, that was stricken from the bill. I move that the vote by which the bill passed the Senate yesterday be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida moves that the votes by which Senate bill 6715 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Senators here present will remember the discussion that was had and the fact that the item was struck out not so much upon its merits as it was intended that it might be brought up again in some form by the Senator from Florida. Therefore, as chairman of the committee and having charge of the bill, I acquiesce in the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Florida to move to reinstate the part stricken out.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I now move, if a motion to that effect is necessary, to reinstate in the bill the item on page 2 of the bill commencing at line 21 and going down to and including line 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Florida that the motion should be to reconsider the vote by which the three lines were stricken out.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; the vote by which the bill was passed having been reconsidered, I now move to reconsider that vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida moves to reconsider the vote by which the following item was stricken from the bill. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, the Senate struck out lines 21, 22, and 23 in the following words:

The name of Mary Eddy Driggs, widow of William H. Driggs, late commander, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The questions recurs on agreeing to the amendment striking out the clause which has been read.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON LANDS OF FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to preserve the place of the bill (H. R. 15641) for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, so that it will stand as the special order for to-morrow, subject to appropriation bills and the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that House bill 15641, which was made by a unanimous-consent agreement the special order for to-day, following the routine morning business, subject to appropriation bills, may be given the same right to-morrow morning that it held to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 27, line 1, after the word "elsewhere," to insert: "to continue collaboration with other Departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work; to demonstrate and illustrate the methods for the making of denatured alcohol on a scale suitable for utilization by the farmer, or associations of farmers," so as to read:

Laboratory, Department of Agriculture: General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry: Chemical apparatus, chemicals, and supplies, repairs to engine and apparatus, gas and electric current, official traveling and other expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, labor and expert work and all necessary expenses in conducting investigations in this Bureau in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such investigations; for the rent of buildings in the city of Washington and elsewhere; to continue collaboration with other Departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work; to demonstrate and illustrate the methods for the making of denatured alcohol on a scale suitable for utilization by the farmer, or associations of farmers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 1, to increase the appropriation for the laboratory, Department of Agriculture, from $725,000 to $810,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 8, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Chemistry from $791,720 to $876,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Soils," on page 29, line 11, after the word "countries," to strike out:

To investigate, with the view of improving, the conditions relating to the supply and sale of domestic tobacco to any foreign country or countries where the business of buying and selling tobacco is conducted by the government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 20, after the word "expenses," to strike out "three hundred and thirty-three thousand four hundred and sixty" and insert "two hundred thousand," so as to make the total for soil investigations $200,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from North Dakota wishes to increase the amount for the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to leave it the same as it came from the House.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary of Agriculture in estimating for this purpose estimated $200,000. The House committee reported to the House $170,000. Under discussion on the floor of the House the amount was increased to about $360,000.

We had the Secretary of Agriculture and other officers of his Department before us in the committee, and the Secretary stated that $200,000, the amount of his estimate, was all that could be used to advantage by the Department for the coming year. The Secretary stated that the Bureau had been to some extent, although not blaming it at all, doing work which duplicated that of another Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and that in undertaking to enlarge that work he would have either to take it from the Bureau of Plant Industry or leave it to do the same work. He felt that we should leave it at $200,000, or not exceed that amount for the coming year, until he should make the proposed division and see what was necessary and what work should go to each one of these two Bureaus, in order not to duplicate work and waste money.

I hope that the amendment of the Senate committee may be agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that all the facts which have been stated by the Senator from Wyoming were stated in the House before it voted upon this raise. In other words, I am informed that the House voted for the raise of about $133,460, after having had before them the same information that the Senate committee had from the Secretary of Agriculture. So that matter has been considered before.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator surely will not maintain that, because the Secretary was before us and testified on these comparative amounts. He was unable to do so when he was before the House committee, because there had been no presumption of having the amount as large as was later put on by the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I mean is that the Secretary's recommendation was before the House, and the necessity for a greater amount than that which the Secretary had recommended was also before the House, and after having considered the Secretary's recommendation and having considered the argument in favor of having a larger sum, the House of its own motion put on the extra amount of $133,460.

Mr. WARREN. How much does the Senator say the House added?

Mr. McCUMBER. One hundred and thirty-three thousand four hundred and sixty dollars is the difference.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that they put on over $163,000 in the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply taking the Senator's statement as compared with what was done by the House.

Mr. WARREN. We have allowed more by $30,000 than the House committee allowed.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill as it came before your committee provided for an appropriation of $333,460.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; that was done by the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. And you reduced that to $200,000. That of course leaves a difference of $133,460.

Mr. WARREN. But I wish to call attention to the difference between what the House committee reported——

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. And what we have reported. There is a difference of one hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of the difference between what the House passed and the amount that was reported by your committee, which is a difference of $133,460.

Now, I made some inquiry at the Department to ascertain what they had in contemplation for soil surveys for the next year, and the information I got was that they have in view a soil survey of about 1,400 square miles. I also understand that with this amount they could survey that many square miles, but that if it is cut down $133,000 it would leave them available means for only about 400 square miles of soil survey. That is the information I got from the Department.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The Senator says he obtained some information from the Department.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not from the Secretary.

Mr. LONG. I wish to know whether he obtained the information from the head of the Department, or from the chief of a bureau.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I go to ascertain what the Bureau of Soils has in contemplation, ordinarily I will not ask the Secretary, because I can get the information directly from gentlemen as to what they contemplate doing the next year, and naturally I go there; and there is where I went for this information as before.

Mr. LONG. The Secretary appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and stated the plans of the Bureau of Soils for next year. They differ from what the Senator has just stated.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator, then, how many square miles the Secretary recommended for survey for next year?

Mr. LONG. The Secretary of Agriculture stated the general plans for soil survey, differing materially from what the Senator has just given.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, Mr. President. I do not know that we are absolutely bound by what the Secretary of Agriculture feels that we properly ought to survey for the next year. We people of the West who are making certain demands and going to the Department of Agriculture and asking if they can survey the soil in a particular section of the country, and the Secretary of Agriculture replies that he has no money available for that purpose, can use our own judgment, or at least the judgment of Congress, whether we are to be governed entirely by what the Secretary of Agriculture feels ought to go to the soil survey.

There is a universal demand for an extension of the soil survey, and every year when we apply and ask that a certain section be surveyed we are met with the proposition that there is not money enough appropriated for that purpose.

If we are asking for too much it may be possible that we should appropriate less than our demand is, but I believe that we have not appropriated enough for this purpose. It is most important to the Northwest how much should be appropriated for this particular purpose. It is a matter in which not only the agriculturists of the Northwest, but the agriculturists of the East, are particularly interested in. We have all the way from the Atlantic to the western slopes of the Appalachian range of mountains a soil that has been used up, that has been destroyed to a great extent. That soil may be regenerated by certain processes of cultivation and the planting of a certain character of vegetables. It may be particularly adapted for a certain character of crops. It is very important to the people of that section of the country, those who are compelled to farm, that they shall secure this information if it is possible to be secured. If I read the bill correctly, I find that that is exactly what is intended, because it says:

> Investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life; for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory; for the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts; the investigation of the relation of soils to drainage and seepage waters; for investigations of soils and for indicating upon maps or plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations; to map the tobacco soils of the United States; to investigate the soils and conditions of tobacco growth in Cuba, Sumatra, and other tobacco-competing countries.

Now, that is a very pretty broad provision, and it is applicable to all sections of the United States. I have always believed that we have sufficient country here that is adapted to the growth of the sugar beet, so that we could raise in this country every pound of sugar that is consumed in this country. There is no reason on earth why our farmers should not be making the sugar for the country instead of importing two-thirds or three-fourths of it from Germany or from any other section of the world. I should like to have the soil investigation for that purpose in my own State and in other sections, and especially in the semiarid sections of the United States.

There are large tracts of semiarid land where undoubtedly we can raise some kinds of grain that we can not raise in other sections. It will take chemical analyses and careful investigations of soils to determine this. There are few men who enter into the farming business who have sufficient means to lose a crop for several years, one year after another, until they can determine what the trouble is. This investigation can be made with very little additional expense.

Then, again, there are certain sections of the country which we have found, after the loss of many crops, that the land is not adapted to this character of crop, but it is to some other particular crop. I remember certain sections of the Northwest that were abandoned a number of years ago because they were unable to raise wheat there. They started in a few years later and commenced to raise flax, but after many families had been homeless and after many a crop had been lost. Then that land sprang up immediately from about $1 to $3 an acre to $20 and $30 an acre. But they had to go through a great deal of expense and a great deal of investigation and a loss throughout the entire section of the country that would be many hundredfold greater than the little amount that we are appropriating for this whole purpose.

We want to know where we can raise certain fruits in the United States to advantage. We can not tell this in the newer sections, and possibly not in many of the older sections of the country, unless there is a scientific investigation made in that section.

So I believe, Mr. President, that we have a right to ask for this little amount of something about $133,000, and that the investigation shall go forward to an extent even beyond what the Secretary of Agriculture may deem to be expedient. The people of the whole section of the northwestern part of the United States feel that we ought to have the soil survey carried on to a greater extent than it has been carried on for the past ten years.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, from a memorandum I have the following appropriations for the Bureau of Soils have been made since its inception:

1897	15,300	1904	212,480
1898	16,300	1905	214,680
1899	16,300	1906	204,080
1900	26,300	1907	221,460
1901	31,200	1908	203,980
1902	109,140

Thus it will be seen that the last appropriation was nearly $207,000.

Mr. WARREN. It was $170,000 for this particular purpose. I have the law here. It was $170,000.

Mr. TELLER. I went over these figures some time ago just to see how gradually everything that takes money grows.

Now, Mr. President, we have $368,000 in the bill as passed by the House. Is not that the amount?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that $170,000 was the amount last year, but the Senator takes the amount for the entire Bureau. For the investigation of this particular subject the amount was $170,000, and it is the proposition here of the Senator from North Dakota to make it $333,460.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that is not all for purposes of soil survey.

Mr. WARREN. It is for one purpose.

Mr. TELLER. What was done with the difference between $206,000 and $170,000?

Mr. WARREN. Salaries and office expenses, and so forth.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking about expenses of the office. It is not what you have spent for soil survey, as I understand it. I am referring to how much the Bureau cost the first year, the second year, and so on, part of which, I understand, went for the examination of soils and part of it went for salaries.

Mr. WARREN. In that comparison, then, the Senator could quote what is proposed by the House in this bill, which would be $368,160. That is what it would amount to if the amendment of the committee is disagreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has shown us any need of this large amount of money in excess of the appropriation for last year. I do not myself believe that there is such a great and crying demand for this Bureau of Soils.

The Senator from North Dakota says we do not know where we can raise beets. You never will know until you have tried to raise beets. But it is pretty certain that two-thirds of the arid region will raise beets; all of it will raise beets if you can get water on it.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact—and I think his observation will bear me out in the correctness of the statement—that the individual is not able to go into experimentation. Take a great region of country, and it may be well adapted to sugar-beet growing or it may be adapted to a peculiar character of fruits, but the individual can not make the experiment. He must work to make himself a living during all the time. The Government can establish experiment stations for these regions or it can carry on experimental work at a very small cost, and when it determines what the soil is best suited for it certainly is a matter of very great advantage to the country.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. TELLER. I have the floor, and I yield to the Senator from Kansas for a question.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Oregon understand that the appropriation in this bill is for the purpose of establishing experimental stations?

Mr. FULTON. I do not know that this covers that.

Mr. LONG. It does not. That is covered by another part of the bill, where ample provisions are made for experimental stations.

Mr. FULTON. As I understand, a part of it applies to experimental work.

Mr. LONG. It does not.

Mr. FULTON. None at all? I thought it did.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we have experimental stations, and have had them for a number of years. I think every State has one experimental station, and some of them, I think, have more than one. Perhaps they are not all Government agricultural experiment stations, but all States have at least one Government experiment station, where these experiments can be tried. All over the arid West they are raising sugar beets. Kansas is raising beets of a high grade, Colorado is raising beets of a high grade, and in every section of the country where beet raising has been tried it has been successful. I do not think the beet growers are asking anything from the Government of the United States. We commenced seven or eight years ago to raise beets in Colorado, and last year we produced 204,000 tons of beet sugar, while the whole of the United States produced about 450,000 tons of beet sugar. Michigan has tried it successfully, and I believe practically all of that Western country has found itself able to raise beets at a profit. California has raised them. Perhaps they have not raised them in the Dakotas; I do not know about that, but I think they could raise them. They have raised them in New Mexico; they have raised them in Arizona. The drier the climate, the more sunshine, the more sugar there is in the beets. For that reason, perhaps, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and all that section of the country are better adapted to beet raising than is the country east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. President, we do not need any Government aid to point out the areas where we can raise beets, and if we did, $200,000, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient. How much, I will ask the acting chairman of the committee, is the appropriation as it now stands?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I mean for experimentation.

Mr. WARREN. There would be $200,000 left if the committee amendment is adopted for the particular analysis of soils outside of office expenditures.

Mr. LONG. Which is the estimate.

Mr. WARREN. We have gone from $15,000 to $200,000 inside of eight years.

Mr. LONG. Which is the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture, and is all that the Secretary informed the committee he desired.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it would be a remarkable exhibition of our generosity if we should go beyond what the Secretary of Agriculture asks.

Mr. LONG. That is the proposition, as I understand, which is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. While I have a very high opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, I know that his Scotch blood never restrains him from asking for what he wants and what he thinks he needs. If he did not ask for more than $200,000, he does not need more.

Mr. FULTON. May I ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. What particular purpose had the committee of the other House for inserting this extra $133,000?

Mr. WARREN. The committee of the House did not insert it.

Mr. FULTON. The bill came from the other House.

Mr. WARREN. It was inserted on the floor.

Mr. FULTON. Well, for what particular purpose was it inserted? It must have been for some purpose.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not want to go into that particularly, but it has been charged, and I think not denied, and I do not think it can be successfully denied, that this Bureau has exploited itself, and has gone over, or attempted to go over, the head of the Agricultural Department. It has written to various Members of the other House and to Senators and others reminding them that there could be so many miles or acres of soil examined in their respective States if they would increase the appropriation.

Now, the point comes that we have a Bureau of Plant Industry for which we appropriate nearly a million dollars. The Plant Bureau is doing certain work. We have a Bureau of Soils doing certain work. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] says it is one of the newer bureaus. It is one that we have increased very rapidly; it is one that I do not wish to unduly restrict or belittle; it is one for which I have always voted the largest amount proposed until this year; but it is perfectly plain that the amount proposed this year is a matter of gratification to the head of that Bureau and those who operate with him, and is a larger amount than is necessary or than can be used unless they propose to go into a region of subjects now covered by the Plant Industry Bureau.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] speaks of the adaptation of crops to soils. The Bureau of Soils analyzes the soils and finds what are the component parts or constituents, and of course must have some idea from that as to what crops might be grown upon given soils. When the Bureau of Plant Industry gets this, those who are connected with that Bureau can adopt the work so far as the altitude, the atmosphere, the amount of evaporation that goes on, the wind, and so forth, and everything of that kind, and they are doing that in considering plant life. Where we have this Bureau of Soils going into that same work, it is simply duplicating the work.

If the Senate desires to put in $130,000 or $140,000 or so to exploit a bureau that is overambitious, when the head of the Department says he is unable to use it satisfactorily and to advantage, of course the Committee on Agriculture will accept that verdict; but, charged with the responsibility of keeping down the appropriations to a proper point and with all generosity and liberality to every Department, it seems to me that we have got to accept somebody's judgment as to how a Department shall be carried on and administered, and I know of no Department head more competent for the duties to which he is assigned than James Wilson, the Secretary of Agriculture.

If we are going to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not duplicate and have going on in two of his bureaus, at a double cost, work that he proposes to do—not duplicate the part that belongs to the Bureau of Plant Industry in the Soils Bureau or the part that belongs to the Bureau of Soils in the Bureau of Plant Industry—when he asks that we wait a year until he can determine what properly belongs to each bureau and then see whether he wants more money appropriated or not, I think we ought to sustain him.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I fear the Senator is probably doing this Bureau an injustice by his remarks.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to do it any injustice. If I did, I should hardly allow the full estimate of $200,000, which is $30,000 more than the House committee allowed. I do not think I have been either unjust or illiberal.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that we have no evidence that this Bureau is attempting to exploit itself in any way. I have no letters or correspondence from this Bureau, but I have telegrams and letters and resolutions from boards of county commissioners and from individuals in my own State and from other sections of the country praying for a sufficient appropriation to carry on these soil surveys.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. MCCUMBER. Just a moment. Upon receiving those telegrams and those resolutions, I very naturally made inquiry at the Bureau of Soils to see what they were doing and what they contemplated doing for the next year. They courteously answered my telephone question. I do not think they are subject to criticism for doing that, and I do not know how they could have avoided answering the direct question that I put to them. I wanted to say this simply in defense of that Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator submit to an interruption at that point?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say that I have had the same kind of telegrams and resolutions from boards of trade and others, and when I wrote back to find what their interest was and how they could be interested, I found where the source of it all was.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I am very positive that some of this information could not have had its source in this Bureau of the Agricultural Department. A section of our State has had soil surveys, and it is quite natural and proper that other sections should want to have surveys of the soil, and, acting upon that, they are giving me the proper and necessary information as to what their wishes are in the matter. Does the Senator think that the money that is appropriated in this bill is sufficient to answer the reasonable demands for soil survey in the country—I do not mean the unreasonable ones, but I mean the reasonable demands for soil surveys?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to answer that now?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Certainly; right now.

Mr. WARREN. The following is the mode of expenditure that is proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture to be initiated the next season. Heretofore, and as he admits, it has grown up so rapidly as to get almost beyond his cooperation. Heretofore they have organized parties from each Bureau to go out into different parts of the country. What the Secretary desires to do is to organize parties in a sort of joint way; supposing there are three in a party, to have one of them, say from the Bureau of Plant Industry, to take care of that particular line of the investigation, and with two of them from the Bureau of Soils, thus carry on joint investigations. So that there would be a third more parties for the same money organized in that way.

It is not his expectation, and it is not the expectation of the committee, that we shall cut out or reduce this work. We all believe in it, and we all wish to support it, but in view of the plan that was proposed, it seemed to us that this was all that we should allow this year, the full estimate of $200,000, which is $30,000 more than they had last year, and with the understanding that instead of these parties working alone in this new country they would partly be made up by men from another bureau, so that they could collaborate the knowledge of analysis of soil and the knowledge of plant growth.

Mr. McCUMBER. That does not quite answer the question; that is, it does not answer it correctly. It answers it by inference only, if at all. My question was, whether the Senator considered that the amount appropriated in this bill would answer the reasonable demands for the extension of the soil survey?

Mr. WARREN. I do. I want to say that we can not do it all in one year. This would not cover the United States, but I do believe that it is all we can use economically and all that we ought to ask for, and with the additions that will follow—and they will very likely be more from year to year, as has been the case in the past—we shall arrive at a conclusion, and that long before we shall in many of the other bureaus that are not so liberally provided for.

Mr. McCUMBER. But after all, Mr. President, it resolves itself merely to the question of the opinion of how far we ought to go in any one year; that is, to what extent we are justified in appropriating a certain sum for a certain year. Many of us believe that we could to great advantage appropriate a quarter of a million for this purpose. As I understand, there are about $80,000 really available for what we call the soil surveys; and if the additional $133,000 were appropriated, it would make something over $210,000 for that purpose. I do not believe that that is any too much, but I do understand——

Mr. WARREN. How does the Senator arrive at those figures?

Mr. McCUMBER. But I do understand that of the general appropriation for soil survey, as arranged by the Agricultural Department, there is used for the soil survey alone about $80,000 and that that is proposed for next year.

Mr. WARREN. Where does the Senator get that from?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the information I get by making inquiry at the Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask the Senator to give us the information from the bill. We are proposing here to give $200,000, and we are also providing outside of that for $34,700 to pay the other expenses of that Bureau. I hardly see where the balance of the money can go.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will find by reading the section that there are several divisions. One is the investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life. That is not really soil survey. That is what I mean. The next proposition is for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory. That may be soil survey to a certain extent. I mean that in the dividing of the several funds to meet the several propositions that are contained in that section there will be about $80,000 for what we call "soil survey" alone; and we feel that we ought to have from $150,000 to $200,000 for that purpose.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, my attention has been called to this matter by some Members of the other House. As I understand, the work of the Bureau of Soils, among other things, relates to the general subject of soil survey, by which there will be ascertained what particular soils are adapted to particular products, and that another branch of the business is the analysis of soils, not for the purpose of ascertaining the particular products the cultivation of which should be sought in connection with those soils, but for the purpose of ascertaining what are the deficiencies in the soil. That is the part of the work in which the section in which I live would be most directly interested, because it is the oldest section, and of course the question of what particular products are adapted for cultivation in those regions is pretty well known.

But we are deeply interested in all questions relating to the exhaustion of the soil from long cultivation, and especially cotton cultivation, a crop which occupies the soil twelve months in a year and one that is raised by what is known as "clean cultivation"—that is, there is no grass, and the soil is more rapidly exhausted under that kind of cultivation. It is extremely important that soils in different localities should be so analyzed that those who are engaged in the cultivation of the land should be informed as to the particular kind of fertilizers demanded in order to restore its exhausted elements. I do not know whether any work of that kind has been carried on in my section or not. My attention has been called to that by those who are interested in that particular branch of the work.

As I understand from members of the committee, the Secretary of Agriculture does not desire over $200,000, and the question that I am interested in having an answer to is this: Does the Secretary limit his desire in that regard to a certain amount of work which he proposes, or will that amount enable him to prosecute these inquiries in all parts of the country? It may be that he is only proposing to prosecute them in a part of the country. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], as I understood him, how much territory the Secretary proposes to have surveyed. I do not know whether in making that inquiry he limited it to the particular branch of the work he has in view, to wit, the actual survey for the purpose of ascertaining what particular products may be successfully cultivated in particular localities, or whether he used the word "survey" in the broad sense, so that it would include all the various purposes enumerated in this section, including soil analysis. I did not understand the Senator from Kansas to give a reply to that further than to say that the purposes of the Secretary were different from those indicated by the information which has been received by the Senator from North Dakota, but he did not go on to say what the purposes were.

Mr. WARREN. When the Senator is through, I will read what the Secretary said to us.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator reads that, if he gives the information I want, I may be through without saying anything more. I will state it again to the Senate. The information I desire is this: Is the Department engaged in the analysis of soils in the South for the purpose of ascertaining what exhausted elements need to be resupplied to the land and how they are best to be resupplied?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, all of these lump sums cover the whole United States, but parts of the country must naturally wait before every acre can be covered. The investigation, however, is going on, I believe, in all of the States—I do not know that there are any exceptions—though perhaps more work is done in some particular localities than in others.

It takes, of course, certain scientific men, men who are educated for the purpose, and special machinery to carry out the plans, and the Secretary's position was that he was expending the appropriations as fast as he felt he could with economy to secure good results. Of course, if this could be all done in a year, it would be better to appropriate a million dollars, or whatever is necessary; but that is not the best way to do it or the most economical way. When the Senator is through, I will read what the Secretary said to us.

Mr. BACON. Very well, Mr. President. The processes of progressive investigation may be very satisfactory to the particular parts of the country which are selected for the earlier investigation, but to those parts of the country where the investigations are postponed, it will not be so satisfactory, and therefore I desired information so that I might know.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, this is a practical question. How much money can the Secretary effectively expend during the coming fiscal year in this particular work of the analysis of the soil? The surveying parties test the soil analytically and find the quality of it. Then another bureau takes up the question of fertilizers, and they publish bulletins, until they have got a library upon that very question of the enrichment of certain soils that have been deprived by successive cultivation of certain elements of nutriment.

Now, the Senator wants to know in what particular localities and to what extent these investigations or analyses go. I will just give an illustration. In my own county, Harrison County, Miss., on Biloxi Bay, a surveying party made an analysis of the soil and found the base of it was Norfolk sand, and then there were some other things in it. I wanted another survey made in an adjoining county. I wrote to the Department asking if they could not, if possible, make a survey of that country. The reply came very promptly that it was totally unnecessary to have that county surveyed, as one survey was quite sufficient for quite a number of counties, all of them having substantially the same soil and growing the same crops; but if there was any other section of the State that was entirely different, then they would be very glad to send a party. I had no demand from any other county, and so I let the matter drop.

I also want to state to the Senator that, in consequence of these surveys, I was informed that the land adjoining a line drawn east and west through the city of Hattiesburg, which is 70 miles from the coast, in the southern part of my State, is exactly the same land which the Senator has in his State and the same as the tobacco lands that are around Quincy, Fla., where tobacco is raised at a price of from 75 to 100 cents a pound, and that every kind of tobacco known in the whole world may be grown successfully in that belt of country along the Gulf of Mexico. Also, in the State of Texas the very same tobacco can be grown with equal success. The Government now has a great experiment station in Texas, and they are growing there the very finest tobacco grown outside of Sumatra.

Now, if the Senator will permit me—I do not want to trespass upon his time, but with his indulgence——

Mr. BACON. I do not object, except that the Senator is not discussing the particular thought that was in my mind. But I do not object to the Senator's going right on, and I will resume when he gets through.

Mr. MONEY. I am only answering the question which the Senator put.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not answering my question.

Mr. MONEY. I thought I was.

Mr. BACON. I possibly was very unfortunate in not making myself clear to what I know is the very clear apprehension of the Senator from Mississippi; but if the Senator means to state that when the Secretary of Agriculture has made an analysis of the soil in Biloxi, Miss., and says that it is similar to the soil in Georgia, and that the farmers of Georgia should be satisfied with that statement, I must take issue with him, and I understand that to be about the sum and substance of the Senator's suggestion to me.

Mr. MONEY. No; if the Senator will excuse me, that is not what I intended to say. I said land in the same belt of country; for instance, along a line running east and west from the town of Hattiesburg, which is about 70 miles from the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator understood me, it was not the State of Georgia, but that particular belt of country.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator does not permit me to state my proposition. He takes issue with a part of it before the whole of it has been stated.

Mr. MONEY. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BACON. There are many soils in the State of Georgia. The northern part of the State is mountainous; it is a part of the Appalachian range, and the climate and products in that part of the State are very much the same as they are in western North Carolina, or in West Virginia, or even in Pennsylvania, the Appalachian range having very similar climatic conditions, with some little variations in its progress, from the east to the southwestern limit. I suggest, therefore, that the analysis of soil in Mississippi does not meet the question at all of what may be required for soils in Georgia in the same latitude. There is a very great variety from the region in the mountains, of which I have spoken, down to the lesser hills, and then finally on down to the plains, to the border of Florida, where the vegetation is almost semitropical. We have all the varieties of climate and of soil and of conditions which are found in latitudes widely apart, very much more widely apart than the northern and southern boundaries of the State. Therefore, it is important that there should not be an analysis of soils in Mississippi for the purpose of giving information to the farmers of Georgia, but that there should be an analysis in Georgia, and not only of a particular belt on the line of the southern part of the State, which is on a parallel with the section of Mississippi of which the Senator speaks, but in all the varying and very widely extended classes of soil that vary in products. We have fruit sections; we have vine sections; we have cotton sections; we have small grain sections. There are some parts of the State where cotton can not be grown, because it is too high and the climate is too cold. We have other sections of the State where fruits can not be grown because it is too warm. Peaches do not grow in the southern part of the State. They grow in the middle and northern part of the State. Particular kinds of soil are adapted to peach growing as well as a particular kind and climate. In the same way there are products in the southern part of the State that can not be grown in the northern part of the State.

My purpose was simply this: I asked for information from the Senator in charge of the bill, whether the limitation which the Secretary of Agriculture is putting upon the amount that he wishes is because he is limiting the inquiries of the Soil Bureau or whether the investigations which are being made are sufficient to reach all the different sections and meet the varying wants, as I have illustrated, in my own State—wants which, while I illustrate them in my own State, I recognize exist in all other States, not in exactly the same conditions, but in similar ones.

Now, it occurs to me that if there is a part of this work which can be accomplished by this proposed increased appropriation, then we ought to vote it, if the work which is being done will not itself accomplish it.

I should like to know, if the committee and those representing it upon the floor of the Senate are in possession of the information, as to what was the particular reason which animated the House of Representatives in its desire to increase this appropriation. I recognize that ordinarily we are not expected to discuss in this House what occurs in the other, but when we are proposing to amend a piece of legislation passed by them, then it is strictly in order and proper that we should know what were their reasons in passing the legislation.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator inquires whether if the appropriation as it came from the House is reduced as proposed by the Senate amendment the necessary work for all localities will be carried on. I doubt not the same condition that exists elsewhere applies to the State I represent. We are informed that unless this appropriation in the bill is maintained, we can not secure the surveys that are very important to our States; and just as the Senator says——

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask the Senator where he got that information.

Mr. FULTON. I got it from my colleague, who has investigated it.

Mr. WARREN. Where did the Senator's colleague get it?

Mr. BOURNE. I got it from the Department itself.

Mr. WARREN. The head of the Department?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes, the head of the Department.

Mr. WARREN. That is, the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BOURNE. No, the Secretary of the Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. You mean the head of the Bureau?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. That brings the matter up just as I stated.

Mr. FULTON. That is what I understood, that it came from that source. I do not care where it comes from. When people go to the head of a bureau and ask for information, they are entitled to have it. It is not discreditable to him or the Representative who goes there for it.

Mr. BACON. I hope I may be allowed to proceed. I am willing to yield to any Senator for a question, but I do not want to be taken off the floor indefinitely.

Mr. FULTON. Just a moment. When I want information that properly comes under the head of a certain bureau, I am going to that bureau chief for it. I know I will get better information, more reliable and accurate information, than I would by going to the head of that particular Department.

Mr. BACON. I am after what is a practical purpose. As I was proceeding to say at the time I was interrupted, when we propose to amend what has been passed by the House, the reasons which induced the House to enact a certain piece of legislation constitute a legitimate and proper matter of discussion here; and we do find the fact that the House of Representatives, after consideration in its committee and a consideration it is to be presumed on the floor of the House, deemed it important that there should be one hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars more devoted to this work than the $200,000.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me just for a moment. The particular point I wish to make is this, If Senators have the information, what were the facts and what was the reason of the House of Representatives in deciding that $130,000 more was needed for this work than the Secretary says is needed?

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is in error with reference to the committee favoring the increase.

Mr. BACON. That was a mere assumption.

Mr. LONG. The Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives did not report this appropriation as it is now in the bill, but reported $170,000 for soil investigations.

Mr. BACON. I will stand corrected as to that.

Mr. LONG. Upon full investigation, after taking seventy-nine pages of testimony on this question, as shown by their hearings, they reported $170,000.

Mr. BACON. I accept the correction of the Senator, but that does not change the fact that the House of Representatives, the nearly 400 Representatives, had a reason, and that reason I am trying to get at.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for just a moment. There certainly must have been some facts brought to the attention of the House as to the inadequacy of this amount, and as to the increased amount of work which it was desired to have done, which induced the House to make this additional appropriation of one hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if he understands, as it has been stated, that this is agreeable to the Secretary of Agriculture? He ought to know as much about it as the House.

Mr. BACON. Of course he knows as much about the subject as the House does.

Mr. TELLER. And he ought to know as much about what the needs are.

Mr. BACON. Very well. It depends on what he considers to be the work necessary to be done.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator will find out by further discussion.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will yield to me for a moment. He is asking questions. I suppose he is asking them for information.

Mr. BACON. Certainly. I am not asking them for any other purpose. But the Senator has not allowed me to reply to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon.

Mr. BACON. Permit me to say just one word in reply to his statement.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; only, his questions come one after another, and I should like to answer them before they escape my mind.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Colorado made a suggestion to which I wish to reply, and then I shall be more than happy to get the information, if the Senator from Wyoming will kindly give it to me.

The Senator from Colorado says the Secretary knows more about this subject and what work is to be done than does the House. It may be that there is a certain part of the work which is within the legitimate scope of the Bureau of Soils which the House of Representatives desires him to do which he does not propose to do and to accomplish which will require this additional amount.

Mr. LONG. I think rather that the work which Members of the House desire to have done the Secretary of Agriculture believes should be done by other bureaus, and not by the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. BACON. I will illustrate what I mean. Take the cotton culture for instance, which is certainly an important industry in this country. It is not a question of what soil is adapted to the production of cotton, but it is a question what elements of nutrition, what fertilizing elements, have been exhausted in the long-continued culture of cotton, and how the soil can best be recuperated from it. It is therefore very important that the soil should be analyzed. What particular element has been exhausted in one locality may be an altogether different element from that which has been exhausted in another locality a hundred miles away.

It may possibly be that the House of Representatives are aware of the fact that the Department of Agriculture is not making the particular investigation in the analysis of soils for the purpose of determining what exhaustion there has been here or there, or elsewhere, which will enable farmers with the greatest knowledge of this exhaustion and this deficiency to supply what is needed to bring the soil back to its virgin state.

Therefore, when the Senator from Colorado says that the Secretary of Agriculture knows best, it is not an imputation that he does not know what particular elements are necessary to be restored to the soil, but it is simply a question whether or not that is one thing he intends to do, and it may be that is the particular thing the House of Representatives desires he should do, and to enable him to do which this increased appropriation is demanded.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from North Dakota desire to interrupt me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I want to make a statement that the Senator may understand what I think is the real difference. If I have the information correctly, under the present appropriation there will be a soil survey of probably about 400 square miles. That means only about eleven townships. One township, 6 miles square, would be 36 square miles. Eleven townships would be 396 square miles, or lacking only 4 miles of being the full 400. Whereas there are in contemplation about 1,400 square miles. It may be that 400 square miles will be sufficient, but I believe that eleven townships to be surveyed for soil purposes in one year does not meet the demands of the country for that character of survey. I believe that that is the view which the House took of it.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator understand you must survey each township in order to find out what the soil contains?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. TELLER. You might take a hundred square miles, and one analysis would be all that would be needed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not mean to say that it is necessary to take every 40 acres or every square mile, but I believe that the work should be properly conducted. I do not believe that eleven townships surveyed throughout the United States, whether by separate square miles or whether a whole township is surveyed together, would be sufficient to answer the demand for reasonable information throughout the country as to the character of the soil.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I asked the permission of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], when he interrupted me, that I might reply to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and I shall be most glad if the Senator will give the information I sought, if he has it.

Mr. WARREN. I would rather wait until the Senator has finished.

Mr. BACON. I yield the floor to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. If I can remember the questions, the Senator first asked what probably influenced the House. I read the debate carefully as it went on there and have looked it over carefully since. The Senator knows how hurriedly appropriation bills are handled in the House and how little attention is given to them. My impression of that debate is that various Members had asked the head of the Bureau or somebody connected with it if they could have so-and-so surveyed in their States, and the reply was yes, if they would appropriate money enough. There does not seem to be any particular locality which complains of having been neglected. There does not appear to have been any particular amount arrived at through any mathematical calculation.

I will read a few words from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture before our committee. We did not interrogate him to any great extent, because we had the House testimony—and there are about a thousand pages in their hearings—as well as the RECORD of the proceedings in the House. When we came to that Secretary Wilson said:

> Now, we come to "soil investigations," and there should be a frank statement made to the committee.
> I had estimated $200,000, and that was increased in the House in the bill we have now to $333,460.
> There has been a great deal done that we knew nothing about until I saw it come to the surface. I have instructed all of my people not to lobby for anything, and it is well understood. I never come to the Capitol myself unless I am sent for—never. I made a careful study of this work and was satisfied that the estimate I made of $200,000—which was $30,000 more than last year—was abundant. That is what I estimated.
> Senator LONG. The committee in reporting $170,000, then, reported just the same as the appropriation was last year?
> Secretary WILSON. Precisely. That is what they did. Now, the design in the minds of our soil people is to not only do the soiling, but to duplicate the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry and do the management of it, and they offered an amendment in the House—I think you will find it here—giving them authority to do this demonstration and utilization work.

That is true. In order to furnish an excuse for this money, they want to do this work which is being done in another Bureau.

> Senator LONG. Work that is now being done by the Bureau of Plant Industry?
> Secretary WILSON. Yes.
> The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Right there let me ask this: As I understand the soil industry, it is to find what is in the soil?
> Secretary WILSON. That is it.

Mr. CLAY. That is an analysis of the soil, I presume.

Mr. WARREN. Of course.

Mr. CLAY. I presume the purpose of the analysis of the soil is to see what kind of vegetation it is adapted to.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. You have to find out what is in it.

Mr. CLAY. That is true. He does not have reference to minerals.

Mr. WARREN. Of course not.

Mr. CLAY. He has reference to the quality of the soil.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. And what it will probably produce. Then the plant industry should take it up and adapt the plants as to the latitude, the longitude, the atmosphere, and all that?

Secretary WILSON. Precisely.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. First to see whether the soil has the proper component parts, and then to see whether the other conditions are all right to grow a certain crop. That is the idea, is it not?

Secretary WILSON. Yes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. And you will be enabled to carry out your plan if we give you that much?

Secretary WILSON. Oh, surely. The bureaus, the scientific bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, always overlap a little, and I let the overlapping go on until it becomes quite prominent, and then make a division and order so much of it here and so much of it there. For example, a good deal of the soil work was once done by the Bureau of Chemistry, under Doctor Wiley. I turned it over, after studying the matter, to the Soil Bureau. I said: "I want all that work in one place." This is the statement I made to the soils people; this is the statement I made to the House committee, and it is the statement I make to you. I will say the same thing all along the line.

Then later the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] asked:

Do you need this $333,000 for this purpose?

Secretary WILSON. No; I stand by my estimate. We can do that work, I think, as fast as it ought to be done without that.

Senator SIMMONS. Your estimate was $200,000?

Secretary WILSON. Two hundred thousand dollars was my estimate.

There was no prejudice on the part of the Senate committee against the Bureau of Soils. Of course I do think, as I said before, that the head of the Bureau ought not to undertake to run a propaganda all over the country by addressing boards of trade or county commissioners to get them to appeal to their Senators to take it up on the floor and ride over the committees of the House and the Senate and ride over the Secretary and those who have the interest of their industry at heart, but also have other things to think of. I do not blame men for becoming enthusiasts in their work. I do not blame a chief for undertaking to magnify his bureau. It is a matter of interest. But in providing for all of these things it seems to me the committees which are charged with these duties must consider for themselves the appropriations and the wants of the country and other matters that are also before the committee. It seemed to the committee that all parts of the country would be surveyed under this provision as fast as the Secretary could organize and take care of parties to do the work.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit me to call his attention to one point? I call his attention to this, which it is difficult for me to understand: The Secretary of Agriculture has recommended about $4,000,000 to take care of the forests of this country. I see here—

Total for salaries and general expenses, Forest Service, $3,296,200.

And again:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests.

How the Secretary of Agriculture can recommend $4,000,000, $500,000 to be used just as he may direct, for protecting the forests, and then recommend only $200,000 for testing the soils of this entire country, is something that I can not understand.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. One moment. One-third of this entire appropriation is to go to protect the forests of our country, and there is nothing easier protected than the forests. We appropriate only $200,000 to test the soils and determine whether they are adapted to corn, wheat, vegetables, or fruits, and at the same time the committee propose to appropriate a sum equal to more than twenty times that amount for the purpose of protecting the forests.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think, then, we ought to raise all these others to that level?

Mr. CLAY. I think we have given too much money for forests. You are really giving one-third of this entire appropriation going to the Agricultural Department for the purpose of protecting the trees in this country, and at the same time we are giving to the American farmer only $200,000 to test the soil.

Mr. WARREN. We receive a large income from the forests, I will say, which fact the Senator has overlooked.

Mr. LONG. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the forests are practically self-supporting.

Mr. CLAY. The soil is a great deal more than self-supporting. The soil is supporting everybody else in this country.

Mr. LONG. I mean that the income from the forests is practically equal to the appropriation for the Forestry Bureau.

Mr. FULTON obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FULTON. I yield for a suggestion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask the Senator from Kansas, for the information of the Senate, the amount of the difference between the income of the Forest Service last year and the amount carried by this bill for that very same Service.

Mr. LONG. The statements show the amount.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Kansas made the statement that it was practically self-supporting. Undoubtedly he speaks from knowledge, and I would ask him how nearly self-supporting it is.

Mr. FULTON. The income last year was $1,500,000. This appropriation is $4,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the information I wanted to get.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say that the $500,000 of which the Senator from Georgia speaks is for permanent improvements in the forest reserves—for the building of cabins, homes for rangers, the building of roads, the building of telephone lines.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me? Does he say that under the provisions of this bill the $500,000 is bound to be used for any such purpose? It reads:

And there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $500,000, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct.

He can spend it anywhere he wants and for any purpose he wants.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like the Senator to read the balance of that provision.

Mr. CLAY. I read it all once before. It says:

For the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of national forests.

Mr. SMOOT. That is it exactly.

Mr. CLAY. It is not provided that it shall be used for permanent improvements.

Mr. WARREN. May I remind the Senator that we laid aside the forestry matter for the day? I hope we may proceed with the matter at issue.

Mr. CLAY. I think it is very appropriate to this.

Mr. FULTON. When the forestry matter comes up I may have some observations to submit concerning it. But I pass that by for the present.

I hope that the appropriation as it came from the House for the purpose of soil surveys will be continued. As suggested by the Senator from Georgia, at best, the amount is very small when compared with the vast area to be covered and the great value to the people of the work to be performed.

I observe that in the discussions elsewhere on this bill it was suggested, and it has been suggested here, indeed, by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that a soil survey in one section or one district of the country would afford ample information for the surrounding country and for the other portions of the State.

Mr. MONEY. I did not say that.

Mr. FULTON. I understood that was the Senator's contention. Anyway, it was so contended in the House in opposition to the increase there adopted. But it was clearly shown there, as it can be demonstrated elsewhere, that the conditions which obtain in one portion of a State may be entirely at variance with the conditions obtaining elsewhere. For instance, take it in my State. Take the western portion of the State, along the coast. The climatic condition, the plant life, almost every condition differs radically from that which obtains in the eastern portion of the State, which is separated from the western by lofty ranges of mountains, changing the climate entirely. The soil is different. The products of the soil are different. Nature is entirely different.

Take the southern portion of the State, and you will find again an entirely different district. We wish surveys of the soils to be made in the different districts. We can not secure them unless we can get appropriations that will bear the expense. If this appropriation is reduced we will not secure them. I suppose that is true in many other portions of the country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not think I have yet made one point clear enough. The Secretary claims, and there seems to be no dispute about it, that a large portion of the money of last year that was appropriated for the Bureau of Soils has been used in nutrition business or investigations. There was a little over $38,000 used in that way last year. Then we have added $30,000, which would give $68,000 more for soil investigation this next year than was used for that purpose last year.

Mr. FULTON. How much additional does the amendment recommended by the committee give for the soil surveys over and above the $170,000 that was originally reported by the House committee?

Mr. WARREN. It gives $30,000 more than that.

Mr. TELLER. Thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. WARREN. Altogether nearly $40,000, and then the nearly $40,000 out of last year's appropriation, which was diverted.

Mr. TELLER. In all, nearly $80,000.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I understand that quite well, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming, but still it does not afford sufficient money to carry on the work that is necessary.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. What reason has the Senator for believing that this is not sufficient to carry on the work of soil survey?

Mr. FULTON. For the very simple reason that those who are in charge of it, those who know more about it——

Mr. LONG. The Secretary?

Mr. FULTON. As the Senator from Wyoming has read what the Secretary said, let me say that the Secretary of any of these Departments estimate that they will have so much work and it will take so much money. They want a total amount, and they will pare down one bureau in order to get enough for the particular bureau that they want to carry on a line of work.

Mr LONG. Does not the Senator think the Secretary should determine the work to be done by the different bureaus?

Mr. FULTON. In a measure, but not altogether.

Mr. LONG. Who should determine whether the Bureau of Soils or the Bureau of Plant Industry should do certain work?

Mr. FULTON. Congress should determine what it wants done, what work it deems the most important.

Mr. LONG. Should Congress determine how the work of the Department should be done?

Mr. FULTON. Yes, sir; Congress is the final arbiter in all those matters, and Congress should determine. If Congress should deem that it is more important that the soil survey should be extended than it is that certain other matters within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture should be looked after, it is the duty and the functions of Congress to so determine. I believe myself that we can go to the bureau chiefs oftentimes and get more satisfactory information than we can from the Secretary himself at the head of the Department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose we appropriated this money and followed it with an amendment that it should be expended under the direction of the Bureau Chief? Is not the Secretary of Agriculture the proper man to distribute the money and state how it shall be expended?

Mr. FULTON. No; I think that we should appropriate so much money for soil surveys. It will be expended, of course, in a broad sense under the administration of the Secretary of Agriculture, but immediately by the head of the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I notice in the estimates submitted by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils that he wanted an appropriation of $500,000 for his Bureau——

Mr. FULTON. He ought to have had it.

Mr. LONG. Of which $200,000 was for soil survey. The rest of it was for other purposes. The Secretary of Agriculture believes the other work should be carried on by other bureaus. Does the Senator believe——

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator, suppose that we prefer to have $350,000 devoted to soil surveys, have we not a right to so order it?

Mr. LONG. Undoubtedly. The Chief of the Bureau says that he wants $200,000 for soil survey, out of a $500,000 appropriation. We propose to appropriate $200,000.

Mr. FULTON. The Bureau Chief says that with $200,000 he can only do certain work. I want more work than that done. I want some work in my State, important information which we can not secure if an appropriation of only $200,000 is made.

Mr. WARREN. That is exactly what the Chief of the Bureau calls for.

Mr. FULTON. What amount?

Mr. WARREN. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FULTON. I have not looked at the estimate, but I say that the information now is that unless the amount appropriated by the House is retained in this bill the work that I want to see done will not be done.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FULTON. In just a moment.

Of course I understand that the Chief of the Bureau wants to carry on certain work—we will say $200,000 for soil survey, $200,000 for this, and $200,000 for that—but the question for us to determine is how we want to afford the most relief to the producers, the farmers, of this country. My judgment is that one of the most important works that we are carrying on is the intelligent and efficient soil survey throughout the country. I know it is one of the most important things to us; I know that it is what our people want more than anything else, and I understand we can not get it if this amount is reduced.

I do not care what the Secretary of Agriculture says about it. His statement is made with a view to the amount of work he is going to do and the limitations he proposes to put on it. I am not satisfied with those limitations.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I dislike always in any way to disagree with the conclusions reached by a committee, and would not in this case have said anything if there had not been such a radical change in the bill as it passed the House.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] asks us where our information comes from, and if by any possibility it may be better than that which the committee received. My information comes from agricultural societies and granges in the State of New York. I have a letter here from a distinguished agriculturist inclosing a speech made by one of the members of the New York delegation during the debate when this subject was up before the House of Representatives.

It seems to me that the only question at issue is the time which will be involved in the performance of this work. Everybody admits the necessity for the work and its enormous value. The question is, Shall it be done rapidly or shall it be spread over a longer period, and that depends upon the amount of the appropriation?

The information which I have received from these people who are so deeply interested and who have consulted with the Bureau of Soils is that the difference in this appropriation as it passed the House and is cut down by the Senate committee makes just double the time required to perform the work already mapped out.

This Bureau has done valuable service to the agricultural interests of the State of New York. The surveys which it has made in the counties along the Lake region in regard to grape culture have enriched that industry in that part of the State. They are now engaged in two kinds of work which interest greatly the farmers of New York, one in relation to the abandoned farms in the southern tier and the other the cultivation of alfalfa for the dairy interests.

One would hardly suppose that there were abandoned farms in the State of New York, but it is a fact that in some of the counties in the southern tier the soil has become exhausted. The people of the locality can not, by their own efforts, carry on the investigations which are necessary to make those farms sufficiently productive for profit or even for a living. The result is that farms are abandoned. The work which has already been done in a limited way by the Bureau of Soils survey has brought many of those farms into production again, and the whole of that section is looking with the liveliest interest to an immediate and energetic continuation of the work because of the results following what the Bureau has already done.

The dairy interests of New York are among the largest in the United States, and those interests have been suffering by the exhaustion of dairy soil and are alive to the necessity of finding fresh materials for feeding stock. It has been found that this necessity is abundantly supplied by alfalfa if the soil can be located which will economically and profitably produce it. That has been discovered in a great district, nearly 400 miles in length, between Albany and the Lakes.

Now, constituents of mine who are interested personally, and public-spirited citizens whose studies are in the line of agriculture, feel that unless this additional appropriation is made the work both of reclaiming farms and producing alfalfa will be delayed, to the infinite disadvantage of the agricultural interests of the State of New York.

We find that the committee of the House appropriated, on the information which they had, $170,000. Then, in the debate, on information received from practical farmers on the floor of the House, the amount was raised there to $323,000. Now, the Senate committee, on further testimony, has reduced it to $200,000.

So the whole discussion, from its origin in the House committee until its arrival on the floor here, demonstrates that it is a fluid question, to be determined by the information we can derive from any source where that information can be procured.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I am compelled, much as I regret it, to differ from the conclusions of the committee and to vote for the restoration of the amount passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, according to the figures I have given, this appropriation if left as the committee has it, will practically be $75,000 more than the Department had last year. Thirty-eight thousand dollars I understand was not used, and there is $37,750 more than was appropriated, taking out of last year's appropriation the working force provided just the same as it is now.

Mr. President, I should like to know upon what theory we shall pass appropriation bills if, when the head of a Department comes here and says, "I do not want any more," we force on him $130,000 more. The idea appears so absurd that it seems to me it is a waste of time to discuss it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that this proposition would be absurd if it were not pressed so seriously as it has been this afternoon. The estimate submitted by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils to the Secretary was for $500,000, $200,000 of which was for soil survey, as shown by the hearings before the House committee. That is the amount that we have reported in this bill. Fifty thousand dollars of the estimate was for soil management; $80,000 was for soil utilization.

Certainly the Secretary of Agriculture had some reason when this estimate for $500,000 was submitted to him by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils for reducing it to $200,000. What was that reason? The hearings before the House Committee on Agriculture show the purpose of the Secretary. The Bureau of Soils was engaging in work which the Secretary of Agriculture thought should properly be done by the Bureau of Plant Industry. The Secretary believed that soil management and soil utilization and other work estimated for by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils should be done by other bureaus in his Department. Instead of recommending $500,000 to Congress for this Bureau, the Secretary estimated $200,000 for soil investigations, which was an increase of $30,000 over the appropriation for the current year.

The Committee on Agriculture of the House, after giving full hearings upon this subject, reported in favor of $170,000. The House, probably for the same reasons that the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] has just expressed, so that certain work would be done in the different districts, increased this appropriation. The Secretary of Agriculture should be permitted to determine which bureau should make certain investigations. Some of the investigations which the Senator from New York desires should be made by the Bureau of Plant Industry, in the opinion of the Secretary. Possibly the Chief of the Bureau of Soils thinks they should be done by his Bureau. The bill now restricts the investigations of the Bureau of Soils to the soil survey, and the chief of this Bureau only estimated $200,000 for soil survey.

He wanted $50,000 for soil management; he wanted $80,000 for soil utilization; he wanted $30,000 for erosion. But the Secretary of Agriculture, who I presume knows something about the division of the work among the different bureaus, believes that some of these things can be done better by another bureau in the Department. He came before the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate and said that he wanted only $200,000 for soil investigations by the Bureau of Soils. This is the only work imposed by the bill upon the Bureau of Soils.

In my opinion it would be a very strange proceeding after the Secretary says he wants only $200,000 for carrying on this work for Congress to increase the appropriation for the Bureau of Soils. The work of soil management and soil utilization is done by another bureau and no authority is given in this bill to carry on this work in the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have anything whatever to say about how the public money should be expended. That is not what the Secretary of Agriculture is appointed to his position for. He is simply to recommend to Congress what he may need for his Department.

Congress in its wisdom has the right, and it should exercise that right, of determining in its wisdom what it wants for any particular purpose, and whenever Congress, as representing all of the people, desires to spend a little more money to help out the agricultural sections of the country than the Secretary of Agriculture sees fit to recommend, then I say it is a question for Congress and not a question for the Secretary of Agriculture.

It has been represented here again and again that there is $200,000 appropriated for soil survey. There is nothing of the kind appropriated for soil survey, if I have the estimates correctly. Under the division of this money there will be about $80,000 of it for soil survey, and that is all that will be used for soil survey. That is sufficient to survey about 400 square miles of land.

If the Senator will look to see what this $200,000 is appropriated for, he will find that it is, first, for—

Investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life.

That is not soil survey, nor anything of the kind. The next——

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. The next is—

For the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory.

The next is—

For the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts.

That is not soil survey as we understand it and as you afterwards explain it in the same section.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator just allow me to complete the sentence? Then I will yield to him again.

Now, we have the proposition—

For investigations of soils and for indicating upon maps or plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations—

That is the particular proposition that we want carried forward to a greater extent than it has been carried on to-day. It is not so much with us the question of "the relation of soils to climate and organic life" or "the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory" or "for the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts." One investigation in one section of the country may answer that purpose, or it may take ten thousand, or it may be done here in Washington and not out on the Plains at all. But we do want a certain proportion of this money, which we believe should be used, and that is $200,000, "for investigations of soils and for indicating upon maps or plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations."

The question then would arise: If there are $200,000 appropriated, whether we should, in our judgment, expend $80,000 for this specific purpose or whether we should expend $200,000 for that specific purpose and $133,000 additional for the other purpose mentioned in that section? I will now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's divisions are entirely of the imagination. It is all one matter, one lump sum for one class of investigation—that of soils—and it all comes out in one investigation. That is a matter which ought to be well known to the Senator. If he will look at the estimates made by the Bureau, he will find that there is no such subdivision. The Senator surely does not think that different parties may, under the subdivisions he has named, be sent out to examine just that particular thing or subdivision without regard to the others. It is all done at one time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the information that I obtain is this——

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me make the statement first. The information I obtain is that after we have appropriated $200,000 for all of the provisions under this section that amendment is then divided up. It may require $20,000 for the investigation of the relation of soils to climate; it may require $10,000 for the investigation of the texture and composition of the soils; it may require another number of thousand dollars for another purpose and still another number of thousand dollars for the purpose of investigating soil conditions, and so forth, and for indicating them upon the maps. The information which I get is in these words:

The general appropriation for the soil survey as arranged by the Agricultural Department gives them about $80,000 of this $133,000 for the investigation of the soils and for indicating upon maps or plats by coloring or otherwise the results of such investigations.

In other words, out of the $200,000, $80,000 would be expended for that specific subdivision of the general purpose.

Mr. WARREN. The Bureau of Soils wants $80,000, in the Senator's estimation, for this purpose?

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated where I got my information.

Mr. WARREN. I understand, but does it not come under the survey of the Bureau of Soils?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; we do not disagree on that at all, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. The subdivisions are entirely imaginary. It is all soil survey.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. Let the Senator put it in whatever way he sees fit. If we have $133,000 more appropriated, it can be used for some purpose. The question is where it will be used? If $200,000 is enough to do this work and to survey 400 square miles, and Congress wants 1,400 square miles surveyed instead of 400 square miles, according as the work is already laid out, then we should appropriate for the extra amount.

Mr. WARREN. Why 1,400? Why not 14,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. We might even say, why not a million?

Mr. WARREN. Of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. We could not do it all, to be sure. I can answer the Senator back and ask why not 100, why not 50, why not 10? We have got to keep within the line of reason. The whole question is whether this is a sufficient amount, considering the demands all over the country for soil surveys. I maintain that it is not a reasonable amount when we take the matter into consideration.

Mr. LONG. The head of the Bureau estimated only $200,000 for soil surveys.

Mr. McCUMBER. It may be possible, Mr. President, that the heads of the Departments or bureaus themselves may not think the country needs as much as we do, who are making the demands for these surveys and getting refusals from the Department to grant surveys, because Congress has not appropriated enough money for the purpose. Last year I wanted some surveys in my own State, and I could not get those surveys because there was not money enough. If all Senators who feel that they wish more surveys in their own States should go before the Department next year and say, "We want so much, or we want such a survey to be made in New York, so much in Nevada, and so much in North Dakota," the answers of the Department would be, "Under the appropriation we can not answer all these demands and can not give you what you require."

Of course I will admit that we may demand a great deal more than we are entitled to, or than the Government can afford to give; but this little extra $133,000 was placed in the bill by the House after mature deliberation on the floor.

Mr. LONG. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that a part of the appropriation of last year was not expended——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is no reason at all, Mr. President——

Mr. LONG (continuing). So that when the information was given him that there was not money enough, evidently the information was not very accurate.

Mr. McCUMBER. The information is that we could not get these soil surveys. We did not get the surveys, and we are not getting what we think we ought to have. I can see no serious objection on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to our appropriating what we feel we ought to have.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion. This is an important matter, as we all recognize; but the fact has been brought out that the appropriation of last year, which was $170,000, was not all expended—that there was a large balance left over. Now, I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] if it may not be that the force of scientists to perform this work is not adequate to do this largely increased work for which the Senator is contending?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that that is probably true; but I think that there are enough in the United States, and if the Department would start on a larger scale and start early enough, they could get the requisite number.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator one further question, because my knowledge is not accurate on that point. Has the Secretary of Agriculture authority outside of the law to employ men to do this work or is he restricted by law to a certain force? If, of course, he can go outside and employ men and find competent men to do it, then any amount can be expended, but if he has not that authority, I can see very clearly that the amount provided in the bill, or even a less amount, may be sufficient.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not speak definitely, but I would naturally assume when Congress appropriates a certain sum of money for a specific purpose and charges the Department of Agriculture with the execution of that purpose, that of itself carries sufficient authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to employ the means that are necessary to effectuate the direction of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet the fact remains that last year the smaller amount of $170,000 was not all used.

Mr. McCUMBER. Undoubtedly some reason could be given for that with which I am not acquainted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 20, after the word "expenses," it is proposed to strike out "three hundred and thirty-three thousand four hundred and sixty" and to insert "two hundred thousand."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand the question before the Senate is, Shall the amendment of the committee be agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the question which the Chair stated.

Mr. McCUMBER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. PLATT], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], who is not in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is necessarily absent, to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE. Having a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 9, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 29, line 23, to reduce the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Soils from $368,160 to $234,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Entomology," on page 31, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty-eight thousand eight hundred" and insert "forty-nine thousand two hundred and forty," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That Porto Rico is not excluded; for rent, and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; freight and express charges and official traveling expenses; for office fixtures, supplies, and apparatus; telegraph and telephone service; gas and electric current, $149,240, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 31, line 11, to reduce the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Entomology from $184,960 to $175,400.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I did not move, as we were passing on, to amend the total, because I asked early in the consideration of the bill that the Secretary might correct the totals. I think the total just stated should be changed from the amount as proposed by the committee. I therefore ask that that total may be corrected by the Secretary according to the preceding matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued down to the word "dollars," on page 32, line 18.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend by striking out the word "disbursement" and inserting the word "disbursing." It is an error in the print. The amendment should come in on line 16.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, line 16, before the word "clerk," it is proposed to strike out the word "disbursement" and insert "disbursing," so as to read:

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, who shall be administrative officer of the fiscal affairs of the Department, $3,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Division of Accounts and Disbursements," on page 33, line 2, to reduce the salary of one custodian of records and files in the Division of Accounts and Disbursements from $1,200 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 4, to reduce the total appropriation for the Division of Accounts and Disbursements from $46,690 to $46,490.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Publications," on page 33, line 22, to increase the salary of one assistant in document section, Division of Publications, from $1,400 to $1,600.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 2, before the word "chief," to strike out "clerk now;" in line 3, before the word "folder," to strike out "clerk now;" in line 5, before the word "nine," to strike out "one clerk" and insert "three clerks;" in the same line, before the word "clerks," to strike out "seven" and insert "sixteen;" in line 7, before the word "clerks," to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "twenty-one," and in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-six thousand five hundred and fifty" and insert "thirty-nine thousand five hundred and ten," so as to read:

Two forewomen, at $1,200 each; one chief folder, $1,000; one folder, $900; three folders, at $840 each; three clerks, $900; sixteen clerks, at $840 each; twenty-nine clerks, at $720 each; twenty-one clerks, at $600 each; one photographer, $1,200; one assistant photographer, $840; ten skilled laborers, at $840 each; eight skilled laborers, at $720 each; twenty skilled laborers, at $600 each; one messenger, $840; three messengers, at $720 each; three messengers, at $600 each; two messengers, $420 each; one messenger boy, $360 dollars; one fireman, $720; in all, $139,510.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, after the amendment in line 4 the word "at" should be inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, at the end of line 4, after the committee amendment just adopted, it is proposed to insert the word "at," so as to read:

Three clerks, at $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I also move to amend, after the word "dollars," by inserting the word "each" in line 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 5, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the word "each," so as to read:

Three clerks, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 35, line 12, to increase the appropriation for general expenses, Division of Publications, from $40,000 to $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 15, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Division of Publications from $176,550 to $184,510.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Statistics," on page 35, line 25, before the word "clerks," to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fourteen;" in the same line, before the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "eight;" and on page 36, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "six," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Statistics: One statistician, who shall be Chief of Bureau, $3,500; one assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of Bureau, $2,500; one chief clerk, $1,800; six clerks, class 4; nine clerks, class 3; twelve clerks, class 2; two clerks, at $1,300 each; fourteen clerks, class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; four clerks, at $900 each; four clerks, at $840 each; ten clerks, at $720 each; six clerks, at $600 each; two messengers, at $840 each; in all, $96,640.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill and I also wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have another Bureau of Statistics that does exactly the same work that is being done by this Bureau. I do not want to make any motion in regard to it, but I want to call the attention of those who are more positively directing the legislation here than I am to the necessity for the consolidation of these statistical bureaus into one body. I have had some experience with statistics, and I find that there is frequently a great discrepancy between the report of one bureau and the report of another.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 37, line 4, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Statistics from $221,440 to $221,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 17 on page 37, as follows:

Salaries, library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; one assistant librarian, $1,400; one clerk (who shall be a translator), $1,200; two cataloguers, at $1,200 each; three cataloguers, at $1,000 each; one clerk, $1,000; four clerks, at $900 each; one clerk, $840; two clerks, at $720 each; one messenger, $720; one messenger, or laborer, $480; in all, $18,080.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he has any knowledge as to the character of the books that constitute the library of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. President, I will say in explanation of my inquiry that it developed during a recent hearing that in one school building in the city of Washington there are 6,000 volumes. They have practically a library in every school building in Washington, and I suppose they have in every Department.

Here is a provision for eighteen employees and an expenditure of $33,580 for the library of the Department of Agriculture. An inquiry concerning the particular school building that I allude to developed the fact that they were buying books of fiction as well as other books.

Mr. WARREN. In the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; in one of the school buildings.

It seemed to me a great abuse of the public money. I should like to know, if the Senator has any knowledge, whether the $15,000 that is appropriated for books, cards, and so forth, is meant for technical books and books that are of value to those who are studying the problems connected with the Department of Agriculture, or whether somebody has a free hand, as they seem to have in some of our school buildings, to buy any kind of books he sees fit to purchase.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can only give the Senator the information, generally speaking. The Department of Agriculture, like other Departments, undergoes an examination once in a while by a committee of the House regularly organized for that purpose, and I was informed at the time an examination was made of that Department, in answer to a question respecting the library, that they had held very closely not only to the law, but to the proprieties in confining themselves to books, many of them foreign, pertaining to the particular branches of agriculture, forestry, and so forth, all matters with which that Department has to deal.

Of course the Senator will understand that in a school where there are many teachers and scholars who desire to read fiction the temptation would be to inflate the library beyond what it would be in an institution like the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GALLINGER. But there is a public library for that purpose. It seems to me an abuse in the schools.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator entirely. I think an investigation by him of the Department will convince him that the library is well conducted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to make an investigation. I will add another thing, which, perhaps, will attract attention. How extensive is the library in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. WARREN. I am not able to say offhand; the books are not all in one place, so I am not able to answer.

Mr. GALLINGER. It must be a very large library which requires eighteen employees to look after it. Really I think it is a matter that might well be inquired into by the committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 38, line 21, after the word "apparatus," to insert "for rent in the District of Columbia, not to exceed $8,000; for the construction of a suitable building for shops, stables, and storage, including labor and other expenses, work to be done under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed $25,000;" and on page 39, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-three" and insert "eighty-six," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: Purchase of stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings and heating apparatus; for rent in the District of Columbia, not to exceed $8,000; for the construction of a suitable building for shops, stables, and storage, including labor and other expenses, work to be done under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed $25,000; the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses, for official purposes only; the purchase and repair of harness; the purchase and repair of vehicles, for official purposes only; payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the dispatch agent in New York, not to exceed $400; official traveling expenses; and other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the Department, including not to exceed $2,500 for postage, $86,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 3 on page 40.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I find on page 39 an item for "Office of Experiment Stations; salaries, Office of Experiment Stations," extending to page 40, line 3, and aggregating $34,620.

Then, under another head, "Agricultural Experiment Stations," there are further appropriations. I wish to know if there are two distinct sets of stations, or how it is.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the first paragraph alludes to the Office of Experiment Stations in the Department, while the agricultural experiment stations embraced in the next paragraph are the various agricultural colleges, and so forth, throughout the United States that are provided for by annual appropriations under the Morrill, Hatch, and other bills.

Mr. TELLER. Then this first item of $34,000, on pages 39 and 40——

Mr. WARREN. It is for general administration.

Mr. TELLER. It is really the administration of the station here in Washington.

Mr. WARREN. And all the others, as the Senator will see.

Mr. TELLER. I mean to take care of the reports that come in from them?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 40, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-three" and insert "thirty-three," so as to read:

Agricultural experiment stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," and to enforce the execution thereof, $833,000, $30,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 21, after the word "Hawaii," to strike out "and;" in the same line, after the words "Porto Rico," to insert "and the island of Guam;" in line 24, after the word "That," to insert "not more than $5,000 shall be expended at Guam, and;" on page 42, line 2, before the word "Alaska," to insert "either;" in the same line, after the word "Hawaii," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" in line 5, after the word "Hawaii," to strike out "and," and in line 6, before the word "and," to insert "and the island of Guam," so as to read:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $83,000 of said sum to establish and maintain agricultural experimental stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the erection of buildings, the printing (in Hawaii and Porto Rico), illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins: Provided, That not more than $5,000 shall be expended at Guam, and not more than $26,000 shall be expended for the maintenance of stations in either Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, and to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of such stations, and this fund shall be available until used.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call attention to the fact that there is no agriculture in Guam, and there can not be to amount to anything. It is a waste of money to establish a station there.

Mr. WARREN. That was my impression until the Secretary testified before the committee, to my astonishment, that there are 10,000 people there and that they are to some extent engaged in agriculture.

Mr. TELLER. They are engaged in agriculture that they thoroughly understand, and they will not accept any suggestions from us, because we know nothing about their character of agriculture. It is just about as good as the fifth wheel to a coach.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 20, before the word "all," to insert "and completing;" and in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "seven," so as to make the clause read:

Nutrition investigations: For setting up and completing all apparatus now the property of the Government and used in the nutrition investigations, and for preparing for publication results already obtained, $7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 13, to increase the total appropriation for maintenance of the Office of Experiment Stations, from $1,030,620 to $1,034,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 22, to strike out the subhead "Leave of absence" and insert the heading "Miscellaneous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 24, before the word "The," to insert "Leave of absence."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 7, before the word "To," to insert "Paper tests;" and in line 8, before the word "such," to strike out "by cultivation," so as to make the clause read:

Paper tests: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including the employment of labor in Washington or elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 11, to insert:

Naval-stores industry: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to inquire into the destruction of forests by the production of turpentine and rosin, and the sources and methods of said industry, and in cooperation with the Bureau of the Census to report upon the production of the naval-stores industry, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including the employment of labor in Washington or elsewhere.

Mr. WARREN. In line 14 let the word "rosin" be changed to "resin."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 19, to insert:

National bison range: The President is hereby directed to reserve and except from the unallotted lands now embraced within the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, not to exceed 12,800 acres of said lands, near the confluence of the Pend d'Oreille and Jocko rivers, for a permanent national bison range for the heard of bison to be presented by the American Bison Society. And there is hereby appropriated the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenai, and Upper Pend d'Oreille, and such other Indians and persons holding tribal relations or may rightfully belong on said Flathead Indian Reservation, the appraised value of said lands as shall be fixed and determined under the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 23, 1904, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment." And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to inclose said lands with a good and substantial fence and to erect thereon the necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said bison; and there is hereby appropriated therefor the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; in all, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On the part of the committee I offer an amendment, to come in after line 21, on page 46.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, after line 21, it is proposed to insert:

Mount Tabor Industrial and Manual Training School: That out of the sum of money hereafter annually paid to the State of New York pursuant to the provisions of the acts of Congress relative to agricultural colleges, approved, respectively, July 2, 1862, and August 30, 1870, and of the agricultural appropriation bill approved March 4, 1907, there shall hereafter annually be paid to the Mount Tabor Industrial and Manual Training School for colored youths the sum of $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred eight thousand eight hundred and six" and insert "six hundred forty-two thousand one hundred and forty-six," so as to make the clause read:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, $11,642,146.

Mr. WARREN. We will have to leave the total until the bill is completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be regarded as open. The reading of the bill has been concluded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand we should have an executive session. The reading of the bill having been completed and the forestry section passed over to another time, I will ask that the bill may be laid aside, and I will call it up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROTECTION OF SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I desire to submit a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia with reference to the fire-protection resolution which was introduced, and as it is short I ask that it may go into the RECORD. In making the report the answer was not at hand.

The letter states that a considerable portion of the estimates were placed in the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I have consulted the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], in charge of the bill, and he says that, as he understands, the entire amount that was estimated for fire protection was placed in the bill. If there is no objection, I ask that the letter may be inserted without being read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 30, 1908.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry as to what has been done by the Commissioners with respect to the better protection of the schoolhouses of the District of Columbia against fire, permit me to say that the chief engineer of the fire department is making an examination of all the school buildings, and that his reports have been transmitted by the Commissioners to the board of education, which, under the law, prepares estimates for the public schools, which are transmitted by the Commissioners with their recommendations to Congress, and that as a result of the reports made by the chief engineer of the fire department, the board of education has transmitted and the Commissioners have recommended estimates for the improvement of the school buildings with respect to protection against fire, and that the District of Columbia appropriation bill as it passed the Senate carries a considerable portion of the amount recommended in those estimates for that purpose. In addition to this, every step that could be taken under existing appropriations has been taken by the Commissioners to bring about a better state of protection against fire in the schoolhouses. They have called the attention of the board of education to administrative measures suggested by the reports of the chief engineer of the fire department and by other information coming to the Commissioners from District officials and others, and they are informed by communications from the board of education that appropriate action has been taken. It is believed that everything has been done which could be done to properly meet the requirements of the situation.

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HASKINS). A quorum is present and the Doorkeeper will open the doors; the ayes have it and the motion of the gentleman from Iowa is agreed to, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill (Mr. WATSON in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEIFER. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the proposition under consideration when the committee rose last evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. A certain provision in the bill was passed yesterday with the understanding that on the House going into committee again it should be taken up for consideration.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that that is correct, and I think the first thing to be considered is the paragraph in the bill which was passed with the understanding that it was to be taken up the first thing after going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, that is undoubtedly right. I only desire to retain my right to offer an amendment to this clause, and waive the right now until that is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is correct, the Chair will state.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. At the close of the consideration of H. R. 21260 yesterday I stated that I desired to offer some amendments to the paragraph entitled "Transportation of fractional silver coin." I want to know now if it is in order to do so?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time. The Chairman is informed that there is another matter pending by agreement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have not concluded the consideration of this paragraph?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 9, after the word "examiners," insert "three hundred and," so as to read:

"Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know whether or not there is a point of order pending.

Mr. MANN. There may be a point of order pending, but it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserved the point of order at the time, before I knew exactly what the amendment was. I withdraw that now. The amendment is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the importance of this amendment, and also of the fact that I have some letters to present, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, this proposition as amended will provide $350,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the twentieth section of the so-called "Hepburn law" passed by this House in 1906. It was called to the attention of the House by the President in his last message, as he had theretofore called the attention of the House to it, in this language:

Ample appropriation should be made to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry out the very important feature of the Hepburn law which gives to the Commission supervision and control over the accounting systems of the railways. Failure to provide means which will enable the Commission to examine the books of the railways would amount to an attack on the law at its most vital point, and would benefit, as nothing else could benefit, those railways which are corruptly or incompetently managed.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read two letters—one from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Knapp, and the other from Prof. H. C. Adams, the chief accountant of the Commission, who has charge of the particular work for which this appropriation is sought to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letters in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 29, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. TOWNSEND: So far as I am aware, every member of the Commission is heartily in favor of the appropriation asked for effective administration of the twentieth section of the act, and I am sure there will be extreme disappointment if the appropriation is not made.

For nearly two years we have been planning this work under the able direction of Professor Adams, and we shall be ready to carry it on efficiently just as soon as the money is provided. The uniform system of keeping accounts was put in force on July 1, 1907, and the examination and inspection of these accounts should begin with the next fiscal year. To withhold the needed appropriation would disarrange all our affairs in this regard and postpone the commencement of a most important branch of our work. The machinery is ready, the men are available, and all that is needed for efficient and useful service is the necessary means for defraying the expense. I sincerely hope you may be able to secure an increase of the item in question to the $350,000 which the Commission believes to be the smallest sum that will carry on this work during the next year.

Yours, very truly,

MARTIN A. KNAPP,
Chairman.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
DIVISION OF STATISTICS AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, April 29, 1908.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TOWNSEND: As you are aware, the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission for an appropriation of $350,000 with which to undertake the effective administration of the twentieth section of the act to regulate commerce was not regarded favorably by the Committee on Appropriations, and the amount contained in the sundry civil bill for this purpose is very much less than the amount asked.

Having made some inquiry as to the reasons for this reduction, I am led to the conclusion that possibly the Committee on Appropriations did not fully understand the purposes for which this money is needed and the degree of preparation which the Interstate Commerce Commission has made for its advantageous expenditure.

Permit me to make one or two statements upon this point:

"First. The Committee on Appropriations seems to be under the impression that the Commission was requesting money before it had made adequate provision for its judicious use. On the contrary, the Commission, immediately after the passage of the Hepburn Act, took steps which have resulted in the organization and promulgation of a complete and detailed system of railway operating accounts, which system went into effect on July 1, 1907. During the current year the attention of the division of statistics and accounts has been given to the development of the capital and property accounts. In the meantime the Commission, using its ordinary appropriation, has employed a small number of expert examiners for the purpose of making a sufficient number of examinations to determine by actual experience the best form for organizing this branch of the Commission's service. Not only is the machinery for the administration of the twentieth section of the act now ready, but an available list of men fitted to conduct expert examinations has been secured as the result of a special examination by the Civil Service Commission. The point is, that the appropriation now asked is not an appropriation for a preliminary survey, but an appropriation to do the work contemplated by Congress when this section was enacted.

"Second. I feel that possibly the Committee on Appropriations regards this work differently from the manner in which it is regarded by the Commission. This board of examiners is in no sense a detective agency. Its purpose, on the contrary, is to enable the Commission to assure itself that the carriers are in fact conforming to the accounting orders that have been issued. The final result of a system of prescribed accounts uniform for all carriers and of an examination adequate to guarantee that the rules laid down are in fact followed by the carriers will be to create conditions in which infractions of the law will be of less frequent occurrence than at present is the case."

Another result involved in this system of uniform accounting is that the Commission and the courts will have at hand reliable data upon which to rest their comparisons and judgments when questions of rates or discriminations are under consideration. Speaking yet more broadly, it is believed that the effective administration of a prescribed system of accounts will go far toward creating a condition of confidence in public statements made by carriers, and thus tend to allay the suspicions which at present unfortunately pertain to their reports and statements.

The elimination of injurious speculation from current business practice is universally approved, and the twentieth section of the act, properly interpreted and administered as the Commission has undertaken to administer it, goes a long way in attaining this result so far as the business of transportation is concerned.

I might continue this statement at great length, but will not encroach further upon your time. For two years the Commission has been engaged in providing the means for the administration of the twentieth section. It is now prepared to enter upon the work required by that section, and awaits only the appropriation of Congress for the employment of an adequate number of experienced men. If we have the appropriation available next July, the work of final construction can be immediately undertaken, but if we are obliged to wait until Congress reconvenes, the result will be to postpone effective work along the lines indicated probably until July 1, 1909. I sincerely trust, and in this it is my understanding I express the desire of all the members of the Commission, that some means may be found to avert the necessity of postponing this work.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY C. ADAMS,
In Charge of Statistics and Accounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I did not anticipate that the reading of that communication would take so long, and I feel constrained to ask the indulgence of the House for ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed without interruption for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I stated last evening that I thought some facts should be presented to the committee which had not theretofore been presented which will show the necessity for this amendment. I believe I speak the sentiment of every member of the Interstate Commerce Committee who had in charge the framing of this bill originally that we regard the twentieth section as really the most important of all the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Section 20 provides for a uniform system of accounting; it provides for reports to be made annually, or more frequently if the Commission so desire. The Commission has been engaged in preparing itself for this work for nearly two years. Professor Adams, one of the most competent men in the United States, has had this matter directly in charge. Civil-service examinations have been held for the purpose of securing the men who are necessary to do this work. I submit, gentlemen, it will be a serious mistake for this House not to provide the means necessary for carrying out this provision. It is too late now for us to determine whether we have made a mistake in the passage of the rate bill or not. That act is a statute in the laws to-day, and that law has not been in force sufficiently long for us to say that we will abandon it. On the contrary, the results that have come from the enforcement of that law have been highly beneficial.

I submit there are few gentlemen in this Congress who would repeal any provision of that law. Now, having enacted it, having "put our hand to the plow," it is too late to turn back. We must make this appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the intended object of the legislature in passing that law.

The gentleman stated yesterday, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that some distinguished Members, leading members of our committee, had expressed themselves as not agreeing with the interpretation that the Commission places upon this section. The distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. HEPBURN], who fortunately is here with us to-day, informs me that he has not been consulted, and that he understands the provision of this law as I understand it; namely, that this Commission was not only to prescribe the methods that the railroads should follow in keeping their accounts, but that, under authority of the law, it was to see that the railroads complied with the regulations laid down by it.

I submit that it would be the height of folly for the Commission to promulgate an order, a general order, if it then could take no means and have no way of employing means for enforcing that order. Why, gentlemen, we are told that the pending proposition contemplates the employment of detectives. Ah, but, gentlemen, we employ men to enforce provisions of the law by inspection of national banks not because we believe all bankers are dishonest, but because bankers have great opportunity to be dishonest and the great interests involved demand inspection; and while it is unfortunate that we have to pass any laws in this Congress for restraining evil men and corporations, yet we know it is absolutely necessary. Every great act that is passed restrains the claimed right of some individual or corporation. "Thou shalt not steal" enacted into law denies to the thief the right to practice his profession. "Thou shalt not" in the form of a legal enactment is a prohibition to him who would violate that commandment, and yet the prohibition is made for the common good, and in this case we have been dealing with the railroad corporations of this country, with reference to which there have been great recognized evils which have been practiced, and we have entered upon the administration of law which requires adequate appropriations for its enforcement.

Now, we say to the common carriers, Hereafter your record shall be made public and it shall be kept according to a general uniform rule. The reports that you make shall be such reports as shall command the respect not only of the stockholders, but of the people whom you serve; there shall not be one record for the stockholders and another for the tax collector; and I submit, gentlemen, it would be better for us, having solemnly enacted the twentieth section, to repeal it at once rather than by a failure to make a proper appropriation to say by that we do not propose to enforce it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption? I think the committee agree generally with the remarks of the gentleman. What some of us would like to know is, why this particular amount is required, and just how it is to be expended, because that is the real question before us.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like, if I had time, to call the attention of the House to House Document 802, which is the estimates made by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Committee on Appropriations, in which Professor Adams states explicitly for what this amount, or even a greater amount, is required.

He specifies the number of men called senior and junior inspectors and the ordinary clerks that would be required. He states in detail the number of men that will be needed for the purpose of doing the work according to the plan which he has with such minute detail, infinite pains, and great ability provided for the consideration of the Commission and of Congress. He asks for more than $350,000; but he states that, due to the fact that they can not procure all of the men that will be necessary for this work at once, it may be January 1, 1909, before the full quota of men could be secured and set to work upon this particular proposition, and therefore the lesser amount may do for the coming year.

Therefore I have it on the authority of the chairman of the Commission, as well as of Professor Adams, that if they could have $350,000 now they could put in force this scheme or plan which they have adopted, and which I submit the Congress intended to have carried out, the statement of any other gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding. The language is clear.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state how many men they contemplate employing in this service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The original proposition was 285, when the quota is full. They have now 161, as I remember it—men who have passed the civil-service examination and are qualified at this time to take up the work and commence operations under the provisions of the act.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is this increased force for the purpose of finding out the value of the railroads?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; but I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for calling my attention to that. There are propositions before the country to-day to take an inventory of all the railroads in the United States, and that is a job that would cost the country millions of dollars. I submit that if this provision can be carried out, as was indicated by the proponents of the measure when it was before our committee, we would have the facts as to the value of the property; we would know what the value of the property is, and those reports would be filed with the officers of this Government; and possibly, nay, probably, it would answer the demands which gentlemen make in favor of an appraisal of all the property of the railroads within the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is this new machinery that you want to create for the purpose of finding out the value of the railroads? I did not exactly get your answer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No. Is the gentleman familiar with the twentieth section of the act?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know that I am. I may be familiar with the substance of it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is worth reading.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state it to us?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It provides, in the first place, for all practical and valuable reports to be made by the railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission in reference to their business, their contracts, everything that the Commission may desire to know and that the public has a right to know from a quasi-public servant. It provides for a uniform system of accounting, and it provides this:

> In case of failure or refusal on the part of any such carrier, receiver, or trustee to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda on the books and in the manner prescribed by the Commission, or to submit such accounts, records, and memoranda as are kept to the inspection of the Commission or any of its authorized agents or examiners, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

And furthermore—

The Commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by carriers subject to this act, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission, and it may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the Commission to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by such carriers. This provision shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The paragraph evidently contemplates that which you are trying to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I can understand the English language, then the Interstate Commerce Commission has interpreted this provision as I understood it when it passed the House, and as two or three of my speeches on this subject will verify, and as I believe every other member of the committee understood it, namely, that the Commission has full power to provide how these things shall be done, and then to see that they are done.

Mr. LANDIS. If the gentleman's interpretation is not correct, what virtue was there in the Hepburn Act?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that if the view of this law is correct as taken by the Committee on Appropriations, if it is to be interpreted by the amount they have appropriated——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit, he is not warranted in stating what view the committee has taken of the law. I submit that he should not try to prejudice the members of the committee against the Committee on Appropriations by misrepresenting the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that there is no Member of this House that has a greater respect for the Committee on Appropriations or would hesitate longer to cast any reflection on it than myself. I said at the beginning that I did not believe the Committee on Appropriations understood the needs of this particular provision, and I judged yesterday, and I so admit now, that it was due to the fact that the matter was not fully presented to the committee, but the gentleman did say yesterday that the leading gentlemen of our committee, excepting myself, who had talked with him—and I do not know whether he meant to slur me, but I presume that he did not—understood this provision differently from what I understand it. I submit that I understand the provision as the House understood it when it enacted it into law.

It may cost money to enforce this provision and undoubtedly will; it is unfortunate that we have to expend this amount of money, but I say to you gentlemen that we can not afford to undo all we have already done, neither can we afford to cast discredit on the provision of the law which we on this side and you on that side have exploited to our constituents as one of the things that has entitled us to credit as Members of the National House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think it might perhaps help the House in arriving at a conclusion if, instead of questioning the desire of Members to carry out the section, he would indicate wherein the appropriation made by the committee is not sufficient to carry it out? The question is not one of desire. Everybody wants to do what is proper to enforce section 20.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me, perhaps he did not hear the reading of Professor Adams's letter.

Mr. SHERLEY. I not only heard it read, but I reread it, in order to be accurate. And again, I suggest that what the committee desires to know in order to determine the matter correctly is not the motives of men, but simply what machinery is necessary to carry it out, and what money is needed to provide the machinery. That is the material question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I must have been exceedingly stupid, but I had supposed I had made that clear. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky I wish to say that I said earlier in my discussion that Professor Adams gave a list of experts, or examiners, who were necessary for the work. Does the gentleman from Kentucky want to know what the work is?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. Now, Professor Adams's theory is that it is necessary to have these inspectors constantly working on the books, on the theory that the railroads are not going to comply with the law. Some of us believe that generally the railroads will comply with the law. The difference between these two positions is the question for this House to determine.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would be very glad to discuss that phase of the proposition. In the first place, if the gentleman will give me his attention, I take it he does not question the object sought to be obtained by the twentieth section of the law, and I am going to claim that gentlemen as a general rule approve of things to be done under it; but whether they do or not I will say that it is too late now for us to take consideration of that question, as we have written the law in the statutes and all are protesting their loyalty to it.

Now, section 20 proposes to take account of the methods that the railroads have of doing business as shown by their books. The Commission provides the plan which it hopes shall be uniformly adopted by every railroad doing an interstate business in the United States. Nay, more than that; it is hoped and expected that the method proposed will be adopted by the States. A State road can not be compelled to adopt it, but some of the States are complying with the provision proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had hoped to finish my answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, but I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman state briefly the scope of the work that has been done by the Commission in carrying out the provisions of section 20?

Mr. TOWNSEND. All the Commission has done up to date under the accounting clause during the time that it has been in operation under this law has been to consult with railroad experts and the best men that could be found throughout the United States for the purpose of getting and establishing a uniform system. It has adopted and promulgated such a system. It has taken nearly two years to do that particular work. They have already established it and promulgated their order to the railroads. This was done on July 1 of last year.

Mr. FINLEY. Then about all they have done is to promulgate a plan of operation for the future.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right. They propose by this appropriation, if they can get it, to employ the men, experts, competent men, to go to these various railroads and learn if the orders of the Commission are being complied with, and to obtain information necessary to secure the honest, fair, and impartial management of these common carriers. The scheme contemplates an inspection of railroad accounts and business methods at least once in two years, and oftener if it is necessary, the inspectors going wherever it is found there is special need for their going and seeing that the law is complied with. And, more than that, these visits by these experts will obtain added information which the country needs in legislating in the future on this subject.

Mr. FINLEY. About what will it cost to carry into effect fully the provisions of section 20?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not tell, because there are some provisions of this section that possibly might be carried under other appropriations. I can not divide that. I am talking about the accounting system, the system known as the publicity section of the bill. If there was a full quota of men, and they were ready to start out to-day to do the work the Commission has planned, they estimated originally it would cost about $500,000.

Mr. FINLEY. About how long would it take?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They then propose to keep that up continuously at least until the system is sufficiently established to determine whether it is workable or not. Time alone can tell how long the plan will maintain and what changes shall be found necessary.

Mr. FINLEY. Do I understand the gentleman that it would cost $500,000 for the first year, or for each year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Five hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. FINLEY. Professor Adams said $750,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman want to ask about the $750,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not exactly that. The gentleman said the original estimate was $500,000. Is it not a fact that after the report was made as to the number of men required, they were afraid to make the estimate of how much it would cost, because the estimate would require between twelve and fifteen hundred men instead of 250 men.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Commissioner Harlan so stated before your committee. Mr. Harlan said they had talked this over and when they came to take into consideration the full extent that the Commission thought it ought to go in the first place, it was startled by the number of men and the size of the appropriation that would be necessary to carry it out. I state, however, to the House, that at this time the Commission is convinced that in view of the fact that it can not use the full quota of men in the field now, and not before January 1, 1909, $350,000 will be sufficient to demonstrate the wisdom of the act of the Commission, and it is the judgment of Professor Adams, who has done so much, not only for the United States as statistician and accountant, but, if I may be pardoned for saying so, for the State of Michigan, in reference to the valuation of railroad properties in that State—and he is the man who is the most competent of any man in the United States that I know of to do this work—it is his judgment that the amounts which he recommends and itemizes are necessary to carry out during the year the plan adopted.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, we must go on with this work. I do not want to hamper this Commission in carrying out the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. I would rather spend a little too much money, possibly foolishly if you care to speak of it in that way, than be subject to the criticism that we had failed to do our plain duty in a matter about which we were in such jubilant spirits about two years ago. It is a question of the proper enforcement of a law fraught, as I believe, with great probabilities for good, or by failure to provide the commission with suitable money, nullify that law and stultify every Member who voted for it in 1906.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has said in reference to this question. I think the Congress to-day faces the proposition in reference to the carrying out of what is known as the Hepburn law, and the question of whether we are going forward and enforce the law and whether we are going to retire from the field that it took twenty years for the country to reach.

The most important thing in all the railroad legislation that this country had to face was the question of wiping out rebates. The rebate was a secret gift to the shipper. You can not reach the question, the Hepburn law is null and void, unless you carry to the world publicity, carry to the world the knowledge of what the railroad is doing.

And if we take the position that it is only necessary to appropriate sufficient money to investigate a railroad when you suspect it is giving rebates, when you suspect that it is violating the law, you will never enforce the provisions of this law, and it might as well never have been written on the statute books. [Applause.] The clear contemplation of the Congress when it passed this law was to require that the railroads should keep their books in a uniform way so that every shipper might know whether or not advantages were given to another shipper. The only way that you can enforce that provision of the law is to have these railroads' accounts inspected at regular intervals, and it is folly to say that $50,000 is sufficient money to inspect the accounts of the great railway systems of the United States. Why, I am not surprised when the gentleman suggested that probably it would cost a million dollars to do that work. Possibly it will. I think that the estimate of $350,000 that is requested here by the gentleman from Michigan is too small. I do not believe you can keep up with this system, but what is a million dollars, if it costs that much, to the shippers of this country to carry out and enforce the Hepburn law, and that is what it means?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does it cost to enforce the law that requires national banks to be inspected?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That I can not give the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The banks pay that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The banks pay for that proposition, and I do not know what the cost is, but there is no question that the sentiment of the American people is in favor of enforcing the Hepburn rate law, and whether it cost $500,000 to enforce that law or whether it cost a million to enforce it, it is the duty of Congress to supply the funds, and the only way we can estimate what it is going to cost is to depend upon the bureau which carries out the law. They come before the Congress and say they need $350,000 to start the machinery to carry out the law. Well, we all know, we are bound to know, that $50,000 can not do this work, and, as I say, we have reached the time to-day when, if we intend to stand up for the law we passed four years ago, if we intend to enforce this law, if we intend to carry out the wishes of the constituency that was behind the sentiment that passed the law, we should adopt this amendment, at least, and appropriate this $350,000——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has deemed it necessary to the success of his amendment to question the motives of the Committee on Appropriations in respect to the enforcement of section 20 of the Hepburn act without knowing the reason that actuated the committee on reporting $50,000 instead of $700,000, as originally estimated. I desire, first, Mr. Chairman, to disabuse the minds of members of this committee of any impression which he has left that there has been any attempt, that there has been any desire on the part of any member of the Committee on Appropriations to cripple, to hamper, or in any way to interfere with the enforcement of the interstate-commerce act, especially section 20, with which this provision deals in particular. I voted for the Hepburn act, as he did. I was as enthusiastically in favor of it as he, and I believe in the wisdom and benefit of that law. I believe that it will result in the accomplishment of all that Congress intended should be accomplished by the law.

The practical question presented to this committee the gentleman from Michigan did not even discuss. He never attempted to discuss the merits of the proposition, but contented himself with endeavoring to excite the prejudices of the Members of the House against the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations by unjustified and unwarranted insinuations, which, I hope, are not original and which, I believe, are only borrowed for this occasion, that we were the enemies of this legislation. Mr. Chairman, the House is now confronted with this proposition: Section 20 does not need an army of examiners to enforce it. If section 20 must depend upon an army of examiners for its enforcement, then that section is an absolute failure. The gentleman says we have laws declaring that "Thou shalt not steal." That is true, but who, except the gentleman from Michigan, has ever advocated the proposition that, because we had enacted a law of that kind, therefore Congress should provide for an army of examiners for the purpose of supervising the conduct of every man to determine whether or not he was obeying the law? [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I suggest to the gentleman that for the purpose of enforcing that law we have hundreds of thousands of policemen all over this country, who are appointed for the express purpose of protecting the people of the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. Appointed for the express purpose of detecting the men charged with having violated the law——

Mr. TOWNSEND. More than that.

Mr. TAWNEY. The criminal statute referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] does not proceed upon the presumption that all men are dishonest, that all men are thieves, and that therefore it is necessary to have a sufficient force of men to supervise the conduct of each individual to see that that law is not violated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with this proposition: Here are two policies. One involves the creation of a new service of sufficient size and capacity to audit the accounts of all the railroad companies of the United States.

The present proposition does not go beyond the railroads. They ultimately contemplate having an additional corps of examiners to audit all of the accounts of the express companies and the navigation companies, and all other transportation companies subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. Now, section 20 of that law clothes the Commission, and wisely clothes the Commission, with the power of prescribing the form under which the books of a railroad company shall be kept. It also provides that they must make monthly reports of their accounts and their system of bookkeeping to the Commission. It also provides that there must be a general annual report sent in to the Commission, and it prescribes severe penalties for any failure to comply with these provisions. All of the machinery that is necessary for the enforcement of section 20 will be provided under the provision as reported by the committee. The Commission has prescribed the form under which all the books of the railroad companies must be kept. It has prescribed the rules and regulations in respect to their making reports, and all of these reports must be under oath.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that I may proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks that the gentleman from Minnesota may conclude his remarks.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will conclude in ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] may conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. I object. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection to that request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Commission has already, under the provisions of this section, prescribed, as I said, the form and the method for keeping railroad accounts. They have prescribed what particular items shall be included in their operating and other accounts. They have prescribed methods of bookkeeping for every branch of their service.

Now, if we are going to proceed upon the presumption that these reports when they are sent in to the Commission will not disclose the truth and that, therefore, in every case it is necessary that we should have a corps of examiners of sufficient size to demonstrate whether or not their reports are true, why, gentlemen, it will require an army of men for that purpose and result ultimately in a Federal audit of all the accounts of all the transportation companies in the United States.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman any information as to whether or not the railroads are carrying out the rules provided by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. They have not yet been fully installed. As far as they have, my information is that they are. I was informed by a member of the Commission only recently that the companies are perfectly willing to conform to the system prescribed by the Commission. In conversation with Mr. Adams, the chief statistician, he cited the case of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, where it seemed from their statement that their net earnings during a certain month—I think the month of December, 1907—were larger than the Commission thought it ought to show.

They sent one of their examiners there to examine the books and discovered that they had erroneously included an item of about $185,000 in that month's expenditures which ought to have been included in two previous months. Now, that illustrates the necessity of having a sufficient force of examiners to go and examine the books of any railroad company when the Commission have reason to believe, or when complaint is made, that the company is not complying with the law, and that we have provided for.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will state this to the gentleman, that the employees of the railroad complained and complained and complained, and finally complained to the President, and the President, I think, himself directed this examination. If he had had this money, we would have had no strike down there.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of that practice there was no complaint. That was not the excuse at all. I do not think there was any delay, but when the fact was brought to their attention they found that that particular complaint was not a violation of the rules prescribed by the Commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the gentleman know that in that particular case to which he refers the violation of the provision was discovered by an inspector who was sent there for the purpose of testing that very method that Professor Adams wishes to make universal?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I do not. On the contrary, Mr. Adams states the opposite. Their system had not yet been installed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know he is not informed on that.

Mr. BONYNGE. How many inspectors will they be able to obtain for the $50,000 appropriated?

Mr. TAWNEY. It depends upon what compensation they will have to pay. The rate of compensation has not been fixed. Assuming that they can obtain the men, they concede they will have to be men who are competent railroad accountants. If they can be obtained, they will not be able to get that class of men at a very low rate of pay. But, Mr. Chairman, here is what the committee thought: This is a new service. If this service is once inaugurated, it will never be reduced, no matter how unnecessary it may be in the enforcement of this law. But Congress can always be relied upon to increase the amount if it is necessary, to whatever amount is demanded or required by the Commission for this service. But when we once inaugurate a service, if we start at the top, and it should develop that this service is unnecessary, you will never get rid of it; but if we start at the bottom, in the enforcement of this particular provision, which is now in an experimental stage, and that service is found to be necessary, it can gradually grow as the needs of the service require. If we do that, we will be acting the part of wisdom, and not in any way interfering with or crippling the interstate-commerce law, a charge that is being used to scare Members into doing what their judgment would not otherwise approve.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that this is a new demand for an appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is an absolutely new appropriation. It has never before been estimated for. They have got no appropriation for this corps of examiners. They have some examiners, I think, about twelve, if I am not mistaken, but they are provided for under the general appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, in line with the question asked by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE]? Does the gentleman think that a competent examiner can be employed at a salary of less than $5,000 a year?

Mr. TAWNEY. Two thousand five hundred dollars a year, as I now recall the statement of Mr. Adams, is the maximum they expect to pay.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That seems to me to be a very small sum to pay a competent accountant.

Mr. TAWNEY. It seems so to me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That at the outset would employ twenty men for $50,000. Do you think that they can get the men for that amount? But assuming that they can, that would leave only twenty men to send all over the country from Maine to San Francisco to examine the accounts of these railroads.

Mr. TAWNEY. Your proposition proceeds upon the theory that it would be necessary to send these men all over the United States and examine the books of all the railroads of the United States to determine whether or not railroad companies are complying with the law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that very recently they have been violating the law and making rebates, and have confessed to making rebates within the last two months, two years after the enactment of the law, I think it is very clearly shown that we should have a rigid system of inspection of their books. Now, then, will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question more? Does the gentleman know what salaries are paid to the examiners or inspectors of the national banks?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are not paid by the United States. When a bank examiner is sent to examine a bank he is paid a certain per diem and an amount for subsistence; this the bank pays.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me make a suggestion right there in line with that thought. As showing the very great importance of having a better service and a class of men who would command greater salaries, I have in mind a case in my own State where attention was called to the condition of a bank, which was reported on as all right by the inspector, but in a very short time after a defalcation was made of over a million dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. The incident referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin has occurred, notwithstanding the fact that we have bank examiners, and competent bank examiners.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A bank examiner ought not to be paid by the bank. He ought to be paid $10,000 a year.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota have ten minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. When the gentleman was interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] I was about to ask the chairman of the committee if he would not proceed for a few moments on the same line, and show us that these twenty special agents will be sufficient to do the work necessary during the coming year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for either the Commission or Congress to determine the exact number of complaints that will be made against the railroad companies respecting the matter of their obeying the rules and regulations prescribed for the keeping of their books and accounts.

The theory, purpose, and thought of the committee was that with twenty men, in addition to the examining force they now have, they would have a sufficient force to examine into all of the cases where they had reason to believe examinations were necessary, or where complaint was made until the end of the fiscal year, or until Congress convenes next December, and that then both the Commission and Congress will know a great deal more about the necessities of this service than either the Commission or Congress knows at this time. That was the theory upon which the committee acted. It did not act with any intention or any thought of crippling or interfering in the least with the enforcement of this law; but inasmuch as the Commission itself did not know how many examiners would be required, or how many complaints would have to be investigated, and inasmuch as the Commission has just promulgated these rules and regulations respecting the keeping of books and accounts, the committee thought we might at least proceed for six months upon the theory that all men are not dishonest.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the appropriation contained in this provision is the only appropriation for carrying out the multifarious provisions on this subject, or if there is any more; and if so, how much more?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is $750,000 available in addition. The total appropriation of $750,000 is available for this purpose if they wish to use it for that. They asked us, however, to add to the general appropriation what we thought we should give them for this service; but the committee thought that in view of the fact that this was a new service, it would be of benefit to Congress in the future to know how much this service is costing the Government as contradistinguished from the other services which the Commission render in connection with the enforcement of section 20 and the other provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to ask the gentleman further if the $750,000 he refers to is not for the purpose of carrying out all the provisions of the Hepburn Act?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. That is a very different proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the gentleman admit that the whole argument before his committee was to separate this particular item and the other appropriation which related to the other provisions of the law? And while I am asking that question, let me ask who will make complaint? You say they should investigate only in cases of complaint. Who will know that the law has been violated? Who can make a complaint that the Commission can go on and investigate?

Mr. TAWNEY. When the Commission receives reports from the railroad companies every month in regard to their methods of keeping accounts and keeping their books, if the Commission can not from these reports determine whether or not they are complying with the law or the regulations, or if there is anything in those reports showing anything that would indicate that they were not complying, then the Commission would be justified in investigating and would have the necessary amount and force to make the investigation. We do not proceed upon the theory that all the railroad companies are going to disobey the law in respect to keeping their accounts. Now, if you are going to provide a sufficient force to examine the accounts of all the railroads, good, bad, and indifferent, how much information will you get that will be of no value at all, and how much money and service will be expended in acquiring that information regarding railroads that are complying with the law? What the country and the Commission needs is information as to noncompliance with the law and not as to compliance. In other words, Congress is not justified in proceeding upon the theory that all men are dishonest.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the gentleman why he provides in the same bill $100,000 for inspecting the safety appliances and other special provisions? Why does not the same argument he makes apply to the investigation of national banks?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, Mr. Chairman, we recommend that an appropriation of $100,000 for the investigation of safety appliances——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And we started that at $15,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was just going to call attention to that. We have recommended that because the law authorizes the investigation in the interest and for the protection of the traveling public, and I want, as my colleague has just said, to state the significant fact that we did not begin this work with an appropriation of $100,000, but we began it with an appropriation of $15,000. Now, that is the way in which Congress has always proceeded when we come to inaugurate a new service that is based upon the estimate of those who will be charged with the administration or have control of the service.

The committee has proceeded upon the theory that the Commission can not at this time use the maximum amount it estimates will ultimately be required to give them the service they desire. We have heretofore proceeded slowly, as we gained information from experience as to the necessities of the service, and not otherwise. It is for that reason the committee has recommended what we think will be ample to provide for all the inspection required for the next six months, when Congress will again be in session, and when, if the experience of the Commission shows that more money is needed, more money will be appropriated.

The amount carried in this bill is not because of any antipathy to, or any desire on the part of any member of the committee to cripple or impair or hamper the administration of the law in any way, but we do not want to rush in blindly and appropriate at the beginning more than is necessary for this service, for we know the amount can never be reduced.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this the first appropriation made specifically for carrying out the provisions of section 20 of the Hepburn law?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is the first specific appropriation made for carrying out the provisions of section 20 of the Hepburn law in respect to books of account.

Mr. MANN. Has there been any specific appropriation heretofore on account of section 20?

Mr. TAWNEY. Never on account of section 20, although the section was enacted two years ago. There has never been any estimate for a specific appropriation.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been preparing a uniform system which it proposes to have the railroads put in effect, including books of account, records, memorandum of all sorts.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is work already done.

Mr. MANN. And the railroad companies have been advised to put in practice this uniform system of accounts prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, this appropriation is for the purpose——

Mr. TAWNEY. Of aiding them in supervision where supervision is necessary.

Mr. MANN. In helping them to put it into effect?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And of ascertaining whether it has been put into effect as they make their reports?

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman from Minnesota will pardon me, how much money have they asked for to carry out the provisions of section 20?

Mr. TAWNEY. They first asked for $700,000, and then they reduced that to $500,000 on account of the fact that they do not yet know how much would be needed, and then they reduced it to $350,000 when they found that they could not employ all the people during the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Has the Commission submitted any particular number of men necessary for them to employ?

Mr. TAWNEY. Two hundred and eighty-five to begin with.

Mr. SULZER. At how much of a salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. As I said a moment ago, I do not know that I have that information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Twenty-five hundred dollars, $1,800, and $1,200.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And they want a $7,500 man at the head of it.

Mr. MANN. You can not get very experienced railroad accountants for $1,200 or $1,800 or $2,500. You have to go up into the thousands. Was it proposed under section 20 and presented to the committee practically to have the Government audit the railroad accounts at stated intervals?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; at stated intervals the Commission proposes examination of all the accounts for the purpose of determining whether or not these various items of expenditure are charged in the proper account, and the only way that can be done is by an audit, and they will have to go through all the vouchers of all the railroad companies.

Mr. MANN. If that is to be the policy of the Government, would it not be well to do as we do with national banks, where we practically do away with a certain amount of the work which they would have to pay for privately, and have them pay into the Treasury enough money for this audit, which they do now by private contract?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that would be a far more reasonable proposition. I do not even believe, however, because of the great magnitude of this service and the relation in which the Federal Government would then stand to this great industry, that I should favor the establishment of a service sufficiently large to audit all the accounts and expenditures of the railroad companies, but that would be more reasonable and practical than the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. MANN. There are not a great number of railroad corporations after all. It does not require the services of a great many men to ascertain whether all of the railroads are keeping their accounts and their records and their memoranda in accordance with the way prescribed by the Commission. Railroads are not as numerous as banks and grocery stores, and while their transactions are very large, it is easy for a small number of men to ascertain whether these accounts are kept in accordance with the methods prescribed by the Commission.

Mr. TAWNEY. That may be true, but that is not the purpose of this service as it has been explained to the committee. It is not a mere examination of the books to see whether or not they are complying with the methods of bookkeeping, but they have got to know in order to determine whether or not their statements correctly represent the actual earnings of the companies.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. That is for the audit; but in order to ascertain whether they are complying with the provisions set forth by the Commission, it does not require any large number of people.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that the committee thought the Commission itself would know six months from now, after having that much experience, better than it does now, just the extent to which this examination would have to go and the extent to which this service is necessary to insure the enforcement of section 20, and for that reason the committee felt that it would be the part of wisdom for us to begin at the bottom and let this service develop as the result of experience and provide for it upon a theory.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota what point was made by Professor Adams in his presentation of the matter to his subcommittee?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Adams did not appear before the subcommittee at all. Mr. Harlan, the Commissioner, appeared, and Mr. Moseley.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. What point was made by them asking for a larger appropriation than is allowed in the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will turn to page 179 of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, he will find the testimony of Mr. Commissioner Harlan and the testimony of Mr. Moseley, which begin about that page, and is contained on three or four following pages:

We regard it as the most important feature of our work. That is to say, every transaction between a railroad company and a shipper comes forward sooner or later in some item on its books of account, and through that system of uniform accounts and by means of a board of examiners we will be able to supervise and follow the transactions of railroads and ascertain whether they are complying with the law and obeying its provisions or not. We regard the board of examiners as the crux of the situation. That is to say, it is the one means by which we can enforce compliance with the law and ascertain whether the carriers are in fact obeying it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes, in order to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, again, he says:

Mr. HARLAN. That has been very thoroughly considered. I have before me what we call the "Classification of operating expenses," which goes into the most minute details of the expenditures of railroads, even for such items as glue and tape and string and stationery, and it assigns each one of those ordinary and customary expenditures of railroads to a particular place of the accounting system.

So that the minute details in which these accounts are to be kept, although the number of roads may be comparatively small, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said a moment ago, the magnitude and number of the accounts are very great. The transactions of these roads were never as large or as numerous as they are now. If we are going to adopt the policy of providing a force of men sufficiently large to examine all these several items of account and the vouchers to see whether or not the earnings of the railroads have been properly expended, I say then we ought to appropriate ten times as much as is proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman [Mr. TOWNSEND]. In this service I submit again that we should go slow. Our inspection and special agent service of the Federal Government has been growing by leaps and bounds during the last decade. We had eleven years ago all told only 166 inspectors in that service. To-day we have over 3,000 and are spending over $9,000,000 for this service. It has grown from 166 in 1896 to over 3,000 in 1907.

I submit that we should not become hysterical over this proposition. It is not proposed to cripple in any way the administration of the interstate-commerce law. The Committee on Appropriations is just as friendly to that law as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and always has and always will recommend the appropriation of all the money necessary for its enforcement. But we do not propose our judgment to the populistic demand for unnecessary appropriations for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am surprised that the committee has reported only $50,000 in this bill to enforce the Hepburn railroad law and protests against an amendment of $300,000 being made in this bill. Sufficient funds should be appropriated to enforce this law, or Congress should, in a manly way, say we refuse to enforce a law which Congress made to enforce and the people demanded.

Go back to the Sherman antitrust law, gentleman, passed in 1890 by both Democrats and Republicans. The Harrison Administration did not know what this new law meant, and failed with nearly all the suits it instituted under it. The Cleveland Administration, through the Supreme Court, under the administration of Mr. Harmon, as Attorney-General, had it construed as applying to railroad combinations in the Trans-Missouri case. Judge Harmon then filed a suit against the joint traffic railroad combination, and against the Addison Pipe trust, an industrial combination, and the Supreme Court held the Sherman law applied to both railroad and industrial combinations, and thus paved the way to undo railroad and industrial combinations in restraint of Federal commerce.

General Harmon, as I remember, called for more assistance in his office and more money to enforce this law, and I think his successors renewed this request. They said Congress did not give to the Department of Justice sufficient machinery to enforce the law. Finally, Congress gave the Department of Justice a large amount of additional assistance in officers and money. We were considering the legislative and judicial bill here one day, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] offered an amendment to give $250,000 as a special fund to enforce this antitrust law; and after a considerable stir the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] offered an additional amendment, making the appropriation $500,000, "the very first jump out of the box," so to speak; and although it was subject to a point of order, the $500,000 was appropriated, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], if I remember correctly, voted for it. What else?

Mr. TAWNEY. Right there will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many years was it before they even began to spend that money?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, who complained of that? I will tell you——

Mr. TAWNEY. You complained of it——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I certainly did. I tried to get Attorney-General Knox to spend a part of it in the spring of 1904 in starting an investigation of the tobacco trust, and filed with him more than sufficient evidence showing "probable cause" for "to believe" this trust was unlawfully operated in the purchase and sale of the farmers' tobacco. But instead of Mr. Knox then proceeding to investigate he called on me and the farmers to furnish him with the testimony, and rather than let the investigation be abandoned, I undertook to get up evidence, with the farmers to assist me, for Mr. Knox to file a bill or start a prosecution, all of which he should have been prompt and glad to do, but he "laid flat down on me" and the tobacco people, to the extent at least of calling on us to do what he was fully equipped to thoroughly do and should have done. However, I want to say that Attorney-General Moody late in 1904 or early in 1905 took up the matter where I, with my people, had carried it. We had gotten up a great deal of evidence. But I do not wish to discuss this matter. I have the records to prove what I have stated and am ready at any time to discuss it, but not now.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is $50,000 to enforce the Hepburn law, to examine into the possible railroad wrongdoing, compared to $500,000 we promptly gave to enforce this antitrust law? Congress has annually appropriated about $250,000 to maintain this fund at $500,000, so that there could be no excuse for the nonenforcement of this trust law. Why, this very bill, gentlemen, carries an addition of $250,000 to be added to a like sum now in the hands of the Attorney-General, making $500,000, to enforce the Sherman law against industrial and railroad combinations in restraint of Federal commerce, and yet we are to start off in the enforcement of the publicity provision at least of the Hepburn law with the miserable little pittance of $50,000. What distance will that sum go in investigating the railroads of this country? The sum is ridiculously small. You say the bill carries about $750,000 to carry on the machinery of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that that is enough, but you do add the $50,000 to cover the matter in question, treating the publicity proposition as practically a separate duty imposed upon the Commission.

What else, Mr. Chairman, have we done to enforce and help along the Sherman antitrust law? We have created a new Cabinet office, called "the Bureau of Corporations," or, rather, "the Department of Commerce and Labor," and have appropriated millions of money to employ hundreds of agents and secret-service men, I presume, to look after all kinds of unlawful combinations in restraint of trade and commerce amongst industrial institutions and interstate railroads, and yet this great appropriation committee comes in here and says that $50,000 is sufficient to execute section 20 of the Hepburn law, although we have this new Department of Commerce and Labor backed by its appropriation and the Department of Justice backed by its regular appropriation, with a special appropriation of $500,000 to enforce the Sherman antitrust law. However honest and sincere the committee may be in its conclusions, I can not agree with it. I have no malice, Mr. Chairman, for the railroads or any other concern or individuals. Thank God that I can not bear malice or ill-feeling long toward anybody, and all I want is to defend the law-abiding and make the lawless obey the law.

They make me, they make the humblest man in the land obey the law, but some, at least, of the railroads have not obeyed the law, and when the courts open their books we find secret rebates and free passes have been given, and various other wrongs done, all covered up in their archives. These wrongs should be uncovered and stopped and the guilty punished and the innocent protected, whether railroads or private persons. I say it is our duty to the President, it is our duty to this great Commission and the people, and it is a duty to ourselves to amend this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, give me three minutes more—just two minutes—and then I will have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Gentlemen, Congress put that law on the statute books. Shall we pull its teeth at the start? Did we put it there for it to be a dead letter as the previous law had been? The Sherman law was a dead letter until we revived it by appropriating $500,000 annually in order that that law might be vigorously enforced. Yet the people complain against unlawful trusts and its nonenforcement.

Shall we let this law lie dormant because of the lack of a few hundred thousand dollars? Why put the million and a half of extra money behind the Sherman law and give the Commission a miserable little pittance of $50,000 to use behind this great law that controls the interstate railroads of this country? "Consistency, thou art a jewel!" As for me, I am going to vote for the $300,000, which seems to be enough. I want the law enforced, and nothing but the law. If it is unconstitutional, the great lawyers of my State and other great lawyers will see that it is held up in the courts, and our errors, if any, will be pointed out. But the people have been mercilessly outraged in this country, and I am going to stand by them first. They demand justice. That is their right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, whatever criticism I may have heretofore made in regard to the wisdom of the railroad rate law, it never applied to section 20 that this appropriation is intended to enable the Commission to enforce. I once had what was an unusual experience in high finance and juggling of figures by railroads. In some litigation involving the reorganization of the Monon Railroad that I took some part in, an examination of their books showed that what had apparently been a prosperous road for six or eight years, and which, by virtue of the impression that had been given to the public, had unusual credit, was in point of fact an insolvent, bankrupt road, and that condition of deception was brought about by charging to improvements and capital account what should be charged to operating expense—an old trick of the railroads. I speak of this to show that I have some little degree of familiarity with railroad bookkeeping, and also with the importance of having a uniform system. To my mind nothing can be more important, and if I thought it required not only $350,000, but twice that sum, in order to bring about such a reform, I would vote it gladly. But I do not believe that a case has yet been made, and I am not willing to go on an assumption. Now, what is the assumption? The assumption is this: That having arranged for a uniform system of bookkeeping by all the roads, having required certain facts to be disclosed in a prescribed form, the railroads will generally disobey that law. I believe that is an indictment that is not warranted by the facts. I do not believe that it is necessary in order to enforce a law to have an inspector practically auditing the books of every railroad in America, and until we have something more than an assertion as to such a necessity, I do not feel warranted in voting unnecessary appropriations.

Now, there has been a good deal said about section 20 of the act. There are provisions other than that of inspectors looking to the enforcement of this section. We have heard a great deal said lately, and some of it properly said, about having put the fear of the law in the souls of men in high places. We have heard a good deal claimed by some of having started a crusade that has awakened the conscience of men, and yet the gentleman from Michigan's whole case is predicated upon the idea that the railroads of America are going to disregard this law.

I do not believe it. I do not believe it is necessary to keep United States inspectors on all the books of the railroads. We have hundreds of penal laws upon the statute books. It is a new idea that, in order to enforce a penal law, you must send somebody to be the guardian and watchman of every human being that comes within the purview of that law. It is a doctrine that I think is totally abhorrent to all the instincts of American manhood. I am not willing to indict the people of this country by any such assumption. Now, your law provides:

In case of failure or refusal on the part of any such carrier, receiver, or trustee to keep such accounts * * * such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense.

Not only that, but—

Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any record or memoranda kept by a carrier, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, or memoranda, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

I am in favor of giving the commission a force sufficient to enable them to send out at unannounced times to the offices of any railroad for an examination. I am in favor of giving them a force sufficient, whenever they have any reason to suspect that the accounts are not being kept properly, to make an investigation, and if they find such cases and will then turn in and convict the offender, we will in truth have put the fear of the law upon them.

But to assume that you must send out these inspectors to go over the books in detail at regular periods and all the time is to take a burden upon the Government that is not only useless, but will be expensive beyond the dreams of men. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year will not touch it; three times $350,000 a year will not touch it. Now, I am not in favor in advance, before we have had any experience to guide us, of appropriating these big sums. Why, the gentleman would have us follow the wisdom of Mr. Adams. I have no doubt he is a splendid expert, but he has all the enthusiasm of an advocate. He started out with a request for $750,000, which he thought was absolutely necessary, and he has now got down to $350,000. I think we can afford to go a little slow in the matter. It has been well said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that no bureau is ever started in this Government that ever ceases. No bureau is ever started that keeps its original size; but they grow and expand, until we are confronted by facts that simply cause consternation among those thinking men who realize what it is costing to administer the Government.

But it is not simply the saving of $300,000 I plead for, but it is for a principle and to voice my protest against the theory that we must have an army of inspectors and spies to go around watching the men of America during each hour of the working-day in order to see that these men are honest and do not disobey the law. Such a principle carried out will require a multiplication of officers in every Department of the Government. It is contrary to the whole history of the Government. Gentlemen, we owe most of the popularity of the National Government to the fact that it has not touched the people in any such onerous way, because it has only touched the people in a few important and necessary ways. Once let this Government depart from that time-honored custom and let it undertake the spy system of countries abroad and you will find a protest rise from the very people who are now so quick to clamor against certain men, and business will be the first to complain about this change. If this sum is not given now, we have other years and other appropriation bills, and there will be no hesitancy and no false modesty on the part of the Commission in asking for additional sums. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe section 20 of the Hepburn law to be the most important section of that law. I believe under its proper enforcement more substantial permanent good will come in the way of regulation and correcting corporate abuse than from any other feature of the law. I believe it is a matter of vital importance at this time that a sufficient appropriation be made by Congress to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission not only to establish a uniform system of bookkeeping and accounting by transportation companies of the country, but to inaugurate and fully install that system.

I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in his criticism of a system of Government espionage. It is abhorrent to every instinct of human liberty; but I do not regard an increased appropriation for the purpose under consideration as entering in this Republic upon any system of General Government inspection of railroad books and accounts. A uniform system of accounting has already been established. It has not been fully installed yet throughout the country. I think it is a matter of vital importance that the Commerce Commission be given a sufficient amount of money to see that every railroad in the country adopts the uniform system of accounting that has been already established; and when that system has become general, when it has become recognized as the general system of accounting and bookkeeping throughout the country, we will not need a great army of Government inspectors to investigate and inspect the books and accounts of the railroads as we inspect the banks to-day. Then we can depend, in a large measure, upon the good faith of the railroad companies, we can depend upon the monthly reports required and a reasonable number of Government agents to investigate cases where suspicion may rest as to honest observance of the law. Section 20, unless its provisions be carried out, will, of course, become a nullity; and I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that its provisions can only be made effective by appropriating a sufficient amount of money to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to see that every railroad in the land does adopt the uniform system of accounting and bookkeeping of the Commission; and when that is done, primarily the Commission will have discharged its duty.

I stated at the outset that this is the most important section, in my judgment, in the bill. It carries with it the feature of publicity. It will enable the Government to know exactly what the inside working of every railroad corporation in the country may be, it will enable the country to know all about capitalization, it will increase the security of investors in railroad securities, and allay the suspicion under which many of the railroad companies rest in the public mind.

I believe the sum of $350,000 is a moderate sum for the installation and introduction of this uniform system of bookkeeping and accounting.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no part of the $350,000 proposed here that would be used or is intended to be used for the installation of this system.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not in the least.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg to differ from the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; the cost of the installation is paid out of the general appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But the cost of inspection is a part of the cost of installation.

Mr. TAWNEY. You can not inspect until you have installed, can you?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The establishment of the uniform system in the first place is the act of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The adoption of this system rests with the railroads, and the appropriation for the purpose of having Government inspectors or expert accountants to find out whether the uniform system has been generally adopted is to promote the installation of the system.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will not the monthly reports which they are required to make to the Commission show whether or not they are conforming to the rules and regulations of the Commission?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They ought to, in a general way, but, at the same time, there will doubtless be many mistakes in the monthly reports, and the system of bookkeeping in relation to transportation companies is necessarily to some degree complicated. I believe that every transportation company ought to know that the Government has sufficient facilities to find out whether the law is being violated, and that power ought to rest in the Commission, even though it be not exercised, until the transportation companies do, of their own volition and as a matter of self-protection, adopt and follow the established system of bookkeeping and accounting.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not absolutely certain that in five minutes I can enlighten the committee on this important subject. I have an impression that there is a general misapprehension about the provision in the bill and a misapprehension as to the meaning and purpose of portions of section 20 of the interstate-commerce act.

I do not believe it was ever thought essential to the enforcement of that act or any part of it that we should establish a universal system of espionage, as some Members here to-day contend, upon all these great common carriers. The proposition that is involved now in the amendment, inspired by the persons who are looking after the accounts of these great railroads, comes as a first step in asking that we should begin this work, not of examining into the business particularly of these corporations, but, to use the language of Mr. Harlan and also Mr. Adams, to furnish men to help these roads, or see that these roads adopt a proper system of accounting. They do not propose in doing that, as I understand, to do the things that are talked about here on the floor by gentlemen who declaim, as usual, loudly against railroads and corporations simply because they are railroads and corporations and because they think that spirit of declamation will catch the public ear. The time is coming when somebody should cry "halt" against this vicious method of attacking business everywhere under the cover of assailing public corporations, treating them all as though they were criminal organizations managed by criminals. And while section 20 of the Hepburn Act is proper, this is no time to commence a system of investigation that requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to go through the books of the 1,491 railroads that they have selected out. It will require two years, the Commission's officers inform us, to investigate and see whether they keep their accounts properly; and that is not all, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Harlan says in his letter of January 27 last that this is only the beginning; that the Commission has not yet devised a scheme or plan of providing inspectors for express companies, water lines, pipe lines, and perhaps other companies; that it has so far confined its plans to railroad common carriers. We are only entering upon this. The Commission only need now the first appropriation—$750,000.

If his statement be taken as true, that the proposition is to see that the system of accounts that has been adopted by the Commission and required to be adopted by the railroads—to see that they keep their accounts right, then the appropriation is absurdly great. How long would it take an expert accountant to go over and see whether the great railroads had adopted the system that the Commission has required to be adopted? How long would it take?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, five minutes is not sufficient time for an explanation of this matter. If the plan of Mr. Adams, in charge of statistics and accounts, is simply to see whether the accounts are kept according to the system inaugurated by the Commission, then I think that $50,000 is abundant and quite enough to begin upon. I will undertake to go over half the accounts of the railroad in one year myself at a proper compensation and see whether the system is adopted properly, but my friend from Michigan thinks I am not an accountant.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think you are.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman from Michigan thinks I am no accountant, he is mistaken. I have spent fifty years in going over accounts in litigations and otherwise to find whether there were frauds in them or not. Now, here they want men to go out and spend years of time——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to say that I think the gentleman from Ohio is a good accountant, for he can figure out things that I can not understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I am sorry for that. Very well. I believe in enforcing the interstate-commerce act in every respect, but there is nothing in the twentieth section of that act or anywhere else in it that requires an army of examiners and inspectors. There is a clause in the twentieth section that authorizes the employment of inspectors or examiners or agents for the purpose of enabling them to see what is proper to be done, but it does not attempt to inaugurate a system of espionage. If it did, I should be opposed to it in toto.

I am not afraid to say here and anywhere that when the time comes in this country that we are to inaugurate what some here think this proposes—a system of espionage upon all of our business enterprises, public and private—this country has taken a step backward greater than any ever taken before. If this policy is to apply generally to interstate-commerce railroads, it is equivalent to saying to the States: Get a law in each State that will put a spy on the business of every intrastate corporation in the State. Then will come the cry, Here is a man carrying on a private business, and we do not know whether he is keeping his accounts or running his business honestly, and there must be an inspector in his office. And that will go on until we destroy all the sacred attributes and privacy that belong to the business of the successful people in this country. What the Federal Government does as to interstate business a State will be required to do as to all purely State business, including all domestic and private affairs.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption? I agree with the gentleman as being opposed to this general system of espionage, but I would like to ask him if he is opposed to the system of espionage that would ferret out and discover rebates or discriminations?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman from Minnesota had listened to what I said, he would not have asked that question. I said I was in favor of enforcing the interstate-commerce law, and when necessary I would employ inspectors, agents, and everybody that was essential for the purpose, but I would not inaugurate a system of treating every man as though in his business he was a scoundrel and a thief and ready to rob his fellow-men.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Would the gentleman be in favor of a system where in obtaining the information it should be obtained by giving the criminal an immunity bath?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know what the gentleman means by that. If I had the information, I would punish the guilty.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Would the gentleman seek to obtain that information in such a manner that when he obtained it it would be an immunity to the criminal?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, I do not want the gentleman to get away from the question. This is a question whether we shall put into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission sufficient agents to investigate where they should investigate, and where it is necessary to carry out the matter of the enforcement of their rule with reference to the system of accounting. That is all I wish to say. I do not cry out against the railroads. The country is prosperous by reason of the railroads. The great Northwest has developed a rich country in consequence of it. The railroads have been guilty, no doubt, of many things that were imposed on the country, but there are many regions of our country, formerly inaccessible and consequently valueless, now prosperous, where farms and villages and cities are now found and where large bodies of prosperous citizens have gone and settled, due almost solely to the enterprise of building railroads to them. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MANN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

On April 30, 1908:

H. J. Res. 171. Joint resolution providing for assistance to the people of the storm-swept States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat says that he is in favor of enforcing every provision of the interstate-commerce act, and yet he takes it upon himself to oppose an appropriation for carrying into effect the very thing that he says he is in favor of.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is only one question, I believe, in this whole discussion. This House two years ago enacted, and gentlemen opposing this amendment without exception voted for, what is known as the "Hepburn railroad-rate act." In that act is section 20, which provides for the publicity of the accounting system of railways.

The question before the House to-day is whether we are in favor of enforcing that section. That is the only section before the committee; and if we are, will we give the Interstate Commerce Commission sufficient money to enforce it. The whole question revolves around the point as to the amount of money necessary to carry into effect this provision of the law. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says that the Interstate Commerce Commission has in this bill, if I understood him correctly, $750,000, every dollar of which could be used for the enforcement of this section of the law. This very section the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] seeks to amend limits the amount of money that can be used for that purpose to $50,000, and the gentleman from Minnesota certainly will agree that that is true.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] explain to the committee on what basis he insists that $350,000 is necessary?

Mr. POLLARD. I will be very glad to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Give us the details of the expenditures.

Mr. POLLARD. I will be very glad to enter into that. What I was objecting to in the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] was his statement by which he undertook to leave the impression on the House that the Commission could use the whole $750,000 for the enforcement of this section.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was asked the question by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] if it was not a fact that they had $750,000 in addition, and if any part of that could be used, and I said it could be.

Mr. POLLARD. If I misquote the gentleman, I beg his pardon, but I understood him to say that they had $750,000 that could be used for that purpose, while the section in question limits the amount that could be used for that purpose to $50,000. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Harlan and Mr. Moseley, who appeared before the committee, made estimates as to the number of men that would be required to carry into effect the terms of this section. The Committee on Appropriations, I have no doubt, have given some consideration to that question. We have a right to assume that they have given a great deal, or they would not come in here and cut down the amount from $750,000 to $50,000. That is a pretty heavy drop, it seems to me. The men who are charged with the responsibility of enforcing this law say it will take $350,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The drop was made by the Commission itself, I will say to the gentleman, from $750,000 to $350,000.

Mr. POLLARD. But in the hearings it shows that the Commission dropped from $750,000 to $500,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, and then they dropped to $350,000.

Mr. POLLARD. Now I understand they will be satisfied with $350,000, simply because they can not get more. This is not a question of introducing a general system of inspection of railroads throughout the country.

That is not contemplated at all. Under the figures given by the gentleman from Minnesota, if $350,000 be appropriated, the Commission will have only 140 inspectors at its disposal, and yet the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and others who oppose this amendment contend that it will create a vast army of inspectors, while, from their own figures, it will only permit the employment of 140 inspectors. We all know the extent of the railways of the country. We all know the great mileage of the railways of the country, and we know also that twenty men, which is all that can be employed if this appropriation of $50,000 is carried, are insufficient, manifestly insufficient, to carry into effect the terms of this act. It seems to me if there is one thing that this Congress ought to do above every other it is to grant to that Commission sufficient funds to carry into effect the act that we passed here two years ago. We all understand the intricacy of the questions involved, and we all understand the great evil that existed before the law was passed and prior to the enactment of what is known as the "Elkins antirebate act." We all understand how difficult it is to find out what companies are paying rebates and to whom they are paid.

Under the terms of the Hepburn Act the railroads are required to keep a uniform system of accounts. This amendment will enable the Commission to carry out the terms of that act. It will enable them to inspect these accounts and ascertain what railroads are violating the law. This amendment, if adopted, will make it practically impossible for the railroads to give rebates. It provides funds that will enable the Commission to examine their books. It will throw on the searchlight. That of itself will tend to prevent rebates. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say some things in regard to this matter and to state in the beginning that it is not an antirailroad disposition that prompts me to this utterance. After the Supreme Court of the United States, the most important body in existence under our laws to-day, is the Interstate Commerce Commission. I wish to warn some of the Members of this House against a recurrence of a situation that did occur when the Interstate Commerce Commission for ten long years petitioned Congress for more authority in fixing rates, and met with a nonreceptive hearing. All over this country, after the Supreme Court had decided that the Commission had no power to fix rates, the question was asked, Why was not the Commission for ten years clothed with this authority when they continually asked it? Who knows best now what is necessary, the amount that is necessary, to enable the Commission to enforce the most important section of the Hepburn Act? If the members of that Commission be wise, if they be wisely selected, they know better than a single Member of any committee of this House. Permit me to answer a few of the suggestions of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who always speaks entertainingly and learnedly. He says that this is a proposition to start a universal system of spies. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] echoes the sentiment.

No system on earth is more odious to me than a system of spies; but during the long years of my knowledge of public affairs I have always believed in inspection of public officials and quasi public officials. For eight years I gave to the grand jury at stated periods instructions to inspect the books of public officials of counties. Was it deemed that that was creating a system of spies? Every public official was ready and willing to have his accounts and books inspected if they could bear inspection. If they could not, then they needed this inspection. It is useless to talk about opposition to this appropriation on the ground that it starts a system of spies into private matters. In the same manner this Government has recognized for half a century its duty to appoint inspectors of banks. I know that section 20 has been complied with to the extent that a uniform system of bookkeeping has been arranged.

The law stands now, with section 20, as a magnificent 13-inch gun, but the Commission have no ammunition with which to load it, or to make it effective. [Applause.] I want to say if year after year that Commission appeals to Congress for means to put into operation and enforce section 20, and we go before our people, all of us proud of the part our party took in enacting that law, we will stand stripped of our pretense of desire to regulate railroads if we appropriate only the pitiful pittance of $50,000 to enforce its most important section, to accomplish a purpose toward which it will not grease the skillet. If we do not appropriate more, we had better sweep it all out; if we are to do nothing, let us say so; if we are not going to have these books inspected and the section enforced, let us wipe out the $50,000 and say it is a self-enforcing law.

Now, permit me to say I do not wish to overrun my time, but I regard the railroad service of this country as a quasi public service, its operations to be inspected and regulated as the operations of a bank. They have even more of a public nature than national banks. That being the case I ask those, on our side especially, not to go before the country with the naked pretense that we enacted a very valuable law and we refused to appropriate the money to carry that law into execution. [Applause.]

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to a piece of recent history which I think most emphatically illustrates the necessity of this amendment. Only a short time ago in the very midst of impending financial disaster there was announced by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company its intention of lowering the wages upon that road. All over the country the same threat was impending from railroad companies. It was understood that there was a concerted movement on the part of the railroad companies to lower the wages of their men. The result which would have followed inevitably can well be imagined. They based their proposition of lowering the wages upon the showing of nearly 40 per cent reduction in earnings in the month of December. The President of the United States, facing the danger that he saw was coming upon us, said:

> We will examine your books, we will ascertain whether this is a necessary measure upon your part or not.

He took the inspectors under the interstate-commerce act and they were sent down for the purpose of examining the books of the Louisville and Nashville Company. They were examined, and it was found that instead of having a loss of 40 per cent in the month of December from their net earnings the books had been doctored for the purpose. They had taken the accounts of their expenses for five or six months and put them into the account for the month of December, thereby showing a loss in the neighborhood of 40 per cent for the month of December. This system of inspection that is proposed is not a system of espionage——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Did the case you refer to arise under the system of bookkeeping and accounting that the Interstate Commerce Committee has recommended or under the old system?

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. No; it arose under the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to inspect the books.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, but I asked the gentleman if the system which has been agreed upon now by the Commission and the railroads of keeping the accounts had been in force and that railroad company had made its report every month, if the Commission could not then have discovered from the reports that they were including the expenditures of previous months in the month of December?

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. "And if, and if;" yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; but we had no system then of reporting——

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. But we are proposing to inaugurate this system of accounting, and it requires that inspectors be appointed to see that the system of bookkeeping is carried out in good faith. Without that system of inspection, without an adequate force to enforce the law, how are you going to enforce it? The amendment should be adopted. Ample means should be given to the Commission to carry out the purposes of the law under which it is acting. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a general impression among those who speak against this amendment that a system of inspectors is in the nature of a trained band of spies, and that it inaugurates in this country a character of espionage hitherto unknown. If it be true that this appropriation asked does loose upon men a system of espionage, does place in their offices and other places of business sleuths who have no right to be there, and in good conscience ought not to be there, then I can not see how men as rational and as clear-headed as the able gentlemen who have advocated this amendment can advocate $50,000 for that purpose. A spy is a spy for all that. [Applause.] If it is wrong to put two hundred spies upon the railroad, it is wrong to utilize spies at all.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to say that I am one that does not believe in the $50,000 at all, and I do not understand that any part of it is to be used for a system of espionage except where there is a discovery of some necessity.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman is consistent, at least, even if he is wrong. I do not believe that this means, Mr. Chairman, a system of espionage. These inspectors are necessary simply because of the nature of the offense. With the usual laws against crime, it is not necessary that you should employ any trained man to discover a violation of the law, because the violation of the law brings its discovery. It is not necessary either in State or nation to send out men to discover murder or ordinary theft or robbery, because when the offense is committed the wronged party makes it known. But where an offense lies in a system of bookkeeping and where the party injured is not aware of the fact that he is wronged, it is necessary, in order to make the law effective, that you should not only punish but that you should have the means of discovering it. That is no new principle. The same principle holds with national banks. The fact that banks are inspected does not change the rule.

I would hesitate, I admit, on the presumption that if you sent an inspector to national banks it presupposed that every national banker is a scoundrel. I do not agree with this assertion. It presupposes that every national banker has the means to evade the law, and that he can evade it with impunity unless you are protected by an adequate inspection. The fact that you have a cash register upon your counter does not imply that every clerk is a thief, but it does imply that he may be, that he has the power to be, and that this is the best way to prevent it.

Now, I submit to the gentlemen of this House that the system in force by the railroad companies before the passage of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill did show that the railroads were more prone to violate the law than the banks were to appropriate the money of the people already deposited with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. Now, I see no reason why an inspection of the books of a railroad company should not be as efficient, should not be as careful, as the inspection of the books of a bank; why one should be espionaged and why the other should not.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman recognize no difference between the books of a bank and the books of a railroad as to their relation to the public?

Mr. STANLEY. None in the world, if the railroad is a quasi public corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman must admit that the banks, holding the money of the people of the country and responsible for that money, should be subject to rigid examination, while the railroad companies, having nothing whatever belonging to the public except the privilege of carrying the goods of the public, need not necessarily be examined as rigidly as the banks.

Mr. STANLEY. If a railroad, I will say to the gentleman, had nothing belonging to the public, was a private corporation, why, an exercise of the power of eminent domain on its part would be an outrage. The fact that a railroad can take, through process of law, your property and mine is an avowal on the part of the railroad that it is a public service and has something belonging to the people. The railroads of this country have the people's prosperity and have the power of wealth and plunder in their hands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I will ask that the gentleman may have time to answer a question. Do not the railroads have a power which amounts to the power of taxation?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly; and this bill would not be constitutional, and it would not be necessary if it were not for that fact. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is no dispute between those who oppose and those who advocate this amendment as to the propriety of a strict enforcement of the Hepburn rate act. There is a wide difference of opinion as to what Congress intended when it enacted that law, and as to what it is now deemed advisable to do in order to make the law effective. Before the enactment of the Hepburn law it was recognized and generally conceded that the fact that the various railroads of the country did not have a uniform system of accounting made it difficult to ascertain whether things that were prohibited were being done by the railroads. The Hepburn law provided that a harmonious and uniform system of accounts should be kept. For two years the Interstate Commerce Commission has been engaged in an effort to make uniform and harmonize the system of accounts. It has partially done so, and it believes that by the 1st of July it will have completed a perfect system of railroad accounting.

What was made clear before the committee when this appropriation was asked? I undertake to say that any unbiased Member of this House, when he knows the facts, will be convinced that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no conception whatever of what it wanted and what it intended to do. They submitted an estimate asking $500,000 additional to their previous appropriation, for the purpose of inspecting the accounts of the railroads submitted in accordance with the law. To convince the committee that $500,000 was the proper sum, it submitted a detailed statement to the committee, in which it is conclusively proved that in order to do what it was suggested it wanted to do it would require $750,000 for the first year. Now, the Commission says that if it gets $350,000 it can do the same work. But that was not the original estimate submitted by the Commission.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Is your position that the Interstate Commerce Commission know less about this matter than almost anybody else?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may probably be true.

Mr. HARDY. Are they not considered as able men?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, some of them are able men. Some people consider some of them able men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not the Senate of the United States confirm them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; and the President of the United States appointed them, and it is the presumption that they are able men, and some people think that they are competent.

Mr. HARDY. Then, even under your construction, would they not know better than anybody else what they want?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My position is that the Commission has not yet determined that it knows what it wants in regard to this matter of investigating the accounts of railroads.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They do say they want to enforce the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They want to enforce the law, and I want to enforce the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They say they can not do it without this appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, a lot of people in the Government service say they can not enforce the law unless we appropriate extravagant sums; but our experience has been and will be that they will enforce the law in a proper manner with the amount that Congress gives.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you give them only $50,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will be patient I will tell him why we give the $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Harlan is one of the Commissioners, and he made this statement to the committee, that the Commission had five or six expert railroad accountants, some obtained through civil service and some by special appointment, who had been working out a system of accounting, and let me read what he said:

> With singular unanimity, although they did not take the question up in joint conference at all, these five or six thought it would require from twelve to fifteen hundred men to make a thorough test of the accounts of the railways.

Then Mr. Harlan states that the amount of money that would be required appalled him and Doctor Adams, and they did not estimate the sum that would be necessary. Then Doctor Adams made an investigation of his own and threw aside the result of this independent examination by five or six special expert railroad accountants, and he submitted a statement that 260 men will be able to make the same investigation every two years that the 1,200 or 1,500 men would make every year. Now, if the gentleman will just figure that out, he will find that if 260 men can make a certain examination in two years that much less than 1,200 men should be able to do it in one year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has quoted Mr. Harlan, the youngest member of the Commission. Now, what did Senator Cockrell and Chairman Knapp, who have been there so long, say about it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Senator Cockrell and Chairman Knapp, who have been there so long, selected Mr. Harlan, I suppose, as the best informed and most competent member of the Commission to present their case to Congress before this particular committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then he is speaking for those experienced men—Mr. Knapp and Mr. Cockrell?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; he is speaking for those experienced men. And while Mr. Commissioner Harlan is a young man, he is a son of a distinguished member of the United States Supreme Court, and he is older than I am, and he is fairly competent and should know something about the subject. He was opposed and did not dare to submit to Congress the estimate of what it had originally been figured out it would cost to make this examination.

Now, this question came before the committee in this shape: A law has been enacted requiring a uniform system of accounts from the railroads. The Commission say—it is clear to anybody who reads it—that they wish to audit the accounts of every railroad in the United States every two years, and at their lowest estimate it will take not $350,000 but $750,000 for the 260 men. I leave it to this House to imagine how much it will require if they get the 1,200 or 1,500 men that the railway expert accountants have estimated are required. The committee takes this position: The law requires annual reports and monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission. These statements are examined. Whenever there is a complaint, or whenever there is reasonable ground to suppose that the railroads are not living up to the law, the Commission should have sufficient money to investigate and to ascertain whether they are obeying the law; but so far as the committee is concerned, to undertake to turn loose 1,200 or 1,500 accountants upon the railroads of the country is the initiation of a policy that had never been contemplated by Congress when it passed the Hepburn Act. I undertake to say that you can search the debates of Congress, both in the Senate and in the House, and not even in the able speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] will you find a suggestion that it was proposed that the Federal Government was to undertake to audit all of the accounts of the railroads of the United States after the system of accounting had been perfected.

(The time of Mr. FITZGERALD having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.)

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have no prejudice against the Hepburn law. I have no prejudice against the railroads, and I have no desire to embarrass the Administration in the enforcement of any law. I have not reached that point yet, however, where I believe that every man engaged in a legitimate business, whether it be a business against which a great prejudice has been created in the past, or whether it be a business in which there has been no prejudice created, I have not reached the point where I believe that every man engaged in business is endeavoring to act illegally. Reference has been made to the examinations now made of banks. I undertake to say, if this force be appointed and the investigations be no more successful nor accurate than the average bank examination, that they will be absolutely futile and worthless. I know something about such examinations. I know of a bank which had been examined, where the officials of the bank had been congratulated upon the condition of the bank; and yet hardly were the examiners out of the bank when it was closed because of irregularities in its management that should have been disclosed by a proper examination. These investigations are of no value unless a man goes in to examine with the conviction or belief that there has been some irregularity or some violation of the law. Who believes that there will now be gross violations of the law? For every day that a railroad fails to keep the system of accounts prescribed by the Hepburn Act it is subjected to a penalty of $500, and for every erroneous or improper or irregular entry made in the books it is subjected to a fine of from $1,000 to $5,000, and its officials are punishable by imprisonment for three years in the penitentiary, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Does anybody imagine that with such a statute as that in existence there is much likelihood that the railroads will continue the practices of which so much complaint has been made in the past? I say, so far as I am concerned, that I believe that with the $50,000 available for the next six months the Commission will have an opportunity to demonstrate to its own satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of reasonable men, whether that amount is sufficient, or whether a much largely increased amount should be made available for this purpose.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the statute state when the first report shall be made by the railroad companies throughout the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure that it prescribes when the first report shall be made, but the Commission has made regulations requiring annual and monthly reports, and if I am not mistaken the Commission is now receiving the monthly reports in so far as the system of accounts has been initiated.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Have any of the annual reports been made by companies throughout the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not a complete annual report under the uniform system.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Under the rules and forms prescribed by the Commission?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will any be made by June 30 of this year, or soon after that time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to say.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman think that sufficient inspectors may be employed under the bill as it now is to examine these reports as to form and as to the regularity of the reports themselves?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no doubt that is being done now by the Commission.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The other gentlemen want money enough to employ persons to go through the country and examine into the merits of these reports made by the railroad companies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They wish to send investigators into the various offices of the railroad companies and compare their reports with the books of the company.

Mr. DRISCOLL. In order to find out whether they are accurate on the facts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In order to ascertain whether the report has been made in conformity to the law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And also with the facts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And to find out whether the railroads are honest and whether the reports are made according to the facts. Is it the gentleman's idea that this should not be done unless complaints are first made of the railroad companies, or unless some information comes to the Commission that the railroad companies are violating it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; unless the Commission has reasonable ground to believe that the railroad company is not living up to the law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And it is the opinion of the other side that the men should go out, whether there are complaints or not, and investigate and examine the books of the companies to determine whether or not they make the report honestly and correctly?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; for the purpose, Mr. Harlan said, in answer to a question, that while in a sense much useless work would be done, yet, that it would assure the public that the railroads were living up to the law, and it would be a great advantage to the investing public to know that in every detail the law was being obeyed. My understanding has never been that that was the purpose for which this law was enacted. I understood that the Hepburn railroad-rate law was enacted to protect the shippers and to prevent one shipper from being discriminated against in favor of another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is an important matter that should command the earnest attention and the best judgment of the House. I am in favor of the amendment and shall vote for it. It appeals to my sense of the eternal fitness of things. After much deliberation the Congress enacted this law and it has met with the approval of the people. It is a salutary law, and its most important provision is this section 20, which provides for investigations to ascertain whether the railroad companies are obeying the law or not. The railroad companies of the country must obey the law. That is the order of the day. If they do not, it should be known, and they should be punished like other ordinary lawbreakers.

Now, I say this is a good law and I am in favor of its enforcement. The people of this country to-day are in favor of the enforcement of the law, and the arguments made here to-day by some of the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] are a good deal like the logic of the man who said he was in favor of the law, but against its enforcement. All these speakers say they are in favor of this law, but they seem most desirous of doing all they can to minimize its effectiveness.

If this law is to amount to anything, it must be enforced, and if it is to be enforced, it can only be done through the machinery of an appropriation sufficient to accomplish the purpose. It is said that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not know how much money will be necessary. Possibly that is true, but no more money will be spent in carrying out the intent of the law than will be necessary. I have great faith and confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, and I deprecate the criticisms respecting them thus far made in this discussion. These covert attacks are as unjust as they are unfair. Let me say that the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are gentlemen of great learning, much legal ability, and extensive business experience. They are the picked men of the country, and they are doing a great work that deserves the commendation of the country and the praise of Congress. These Commissioners are clothed with great powers, administrative and judicial; and I do not think there is a man in all the land who can justly find fault with their ability, their honesty, their efficiency, or their competency. I am willing to vote them this money to enforce the law against the lawless railroads, and I am content to trust them not to spend a dollar more than is absolutely necessary. In this connection I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has never abused the confidence of this House by spending a dollar more than was necessary for any purpose at any time.

Now, it seems to me to be a self-evident proposition that if we do not give them the money to do so the law can not be enforced, and we all say we are for the enforcement of the law. But without the necessary funds to enforce it this salutary law—so elaborately defended and so highly praised by all the speakers here this morning—will be about as effective against the railroads as a last year's bird's nest. The position assumed in this very important matter by some of the members of the Committee on Appropriation is as illogical as it is ludicrous.

I am willing to trust the Interstate Commerce Commission. These honest and able and learned Commissioners will enforce this law, will do their full duty, and in doing so will not expend one dollar more than is necessary. Let us, then, do our duty and vote them sufficient money to enforce the law, and if they have more than is necessary we can all rest assured it will not be expended, but will go back into the Treasury.

I think it was either Commissioner Harlan, or Mr. Moseley—a most able, experienced, efficient, and competent man, the popular secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a man who for years and years has been doing a very great work, very little appreciated, and who receives very little pay and very little credit for it—who testified before the Committee on Appropriations that the Interstate Commerce Commission had never gone beyond its appropriation, had never asked Congress for a deficiency appropriation during its existence. If we appropriate this $350,000 and it is not required, it will not be expended. If it is required, to enforce this law against the lawless corporations, it is there for that purpose. We will make no mistake in supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly; I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that of the $500,000 that Congress has annually given to enforce the Sherman antitrust law the Department has expended much less than the amount appropriated? Now, will the gentleman tell me any good reason why we should give only $50,000 to enforce the Hepburn law and $500,000 annually to enforce the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. SULZER. That is a timely question, and I quite agree with my friend from Tennessee. I think, however, the question should be submitted to the members of the Committee on Appropriations. I should like to have them answer the interrogatory. I agree with the gentleman that if we appropriate so large an amount of money to enforce the antitrust law, we should, in all fairness, appropriate a reasonable sum to enforce a law just as important to the people of the country as the antitrust law.

This provision of law now under discussion is greater by far in its effectiveness for good than many people thought when it was enacted, and I want to see it enforced, so that we will not in the future witness the humiliating spectacle so often exhibited in the past of men holding high positions in the railroad world publicly confessing that they are lawbreakers and had to be lawbreakers to get their share of the business. Let us, then, appropriate the money necessary to enforce this provision of the law and indulge the hope that hereafter there will be no more railway violations of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have good reason for stating that I am an earnest advocate of the Hepburn railroad-rate law. I am an earnest advocate of the enforcement of every provision of that law, and to punish any common carrier that violates its terms. I have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House since the Fifty-seventh Congress. It was my pleasure and privilege to be one of the conferees on the Hepburn rate bill between the two Houses, and I believe that I understand fairly well, at least, the spirit of fairness and conservatism that inspired its scope and tenor and prevails throughout that entire law.

Its provisions were framed with a proper regard for the interests of the people and the common carriers. It was not intended to be drastic. The Interstate Commerce Committee has had a great number of bills before it at this session of Congress to change, alter, and amend nearly every section of that law in a great many respects, and I think I am right when I say that up to date not a single paragraph of the law has thus far been amended. I do not mean to say that the committee would not make amendments if convinced the same were proper and necessary. It is an experimental law, as we all know. But few of its leading and important provisions have as yet been sufficiently tried for a fair man to judge their effect. It is intended to solve one of the greatest problems that this country has had for many, many years—that is, to determine what is a reasonable charge on the part of a common carrier for the transportation of persons and property, and to solve it from a conservative, business standpoint and not in an exuberance of spirit to show our hostility to corporations. I fear, Mr. Chairman, that spirit is sometimes too freely indulged in. That is not the spirit in which this House ought to undertake to handle this subject at all. I am no apologist for the railroads, nor will I be a party to any extreme measure against common carriers not demanded by the interests of the people or otherwise.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that very many mistakes have been made here, according to my judgment, this afternoon in discussing this matter before the committee that might have been left out. Gentlemen have proclaimed here on the floor most earnestly and energetically that it was a long time before Congress could be induced by the Interstate Commerce Commission to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate the reasonableness of railroad rates. That is a mistake. That really is an injustice to the Commission. It really is intended to put Congress in the position of being most reluctant to act. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that when the Commission was created in 1887 Judge Cooley, the able and distinguished lawyer, was the presiding officer of the Commission, and any gentleman who takes the time and opportunity to examine the history of the Interstate Commerce Commission during its first ten years will find out that Judge Cooley and the Commission ruled and decided that the Commission had a right to declare what was a reasonable rate after it had properly ascertained that the carrier was charging an unjust and an unreasonable rate.

The first ten years of the life of the Commission discloses the fact that the railroads of the country acquiesced in this ruling by the Commission, and rates accordingly were changed and prescribed without murmur or complaint from the common carriers. There was during that period cordial and friendly relations between the people and the railroads—no bickerings and strife such as has been dilated on. It was not until 1897 that the Supreme Court, in what is known as the "Maximum rate case," held that the Commission did not have the authority to declare what a reasonable rate was. For the next ten years following there really was but little attention paid to the subject of railroads and railroad rates, and I do not hesitate to say that the railroads did exercise and enjoy arbitrary power in many respects, and Congress was not slow in its efforts to curb and regulate them by proper law. The first complaint made by the people commenced some years after the maximum rate case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The people became finally aroused to the imposition they were subjected to, and they demanded relief, and the rate law was enacted.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the whole spirit of this section 20 that is under discussion is entirely misunderstood. It simply proposes to prescribe certain modes of keeping books and accounts, with reports from railroads annually and oftener if necessary, giving amount of capital stock issued, how the same is paid for, dividends, and so forth.

There are a great many things included in it, and is there a gentleman on this floor to-day who would pretend to say for a moment that if the railroads had complied with the requirements of section 20, or are proceeding to comply honestly and fairly with those requirements, that we ought to have a flood of experts or examiners and all kinds of would-be agents of that kind, at a very large expense, to go over all the railroads and examine the books and accounts, and examine all the things that section 20 requires them to examine, when there is no necessity for it, when there is no occasion for it, when there is really no demand for it in the interests of the public? You know, and I do also, that these special examiners would "get busy" at once and stir up friction just to appear that they were earning their salaries. We all know that would be the result—bringing bitterness and criminations where there ought to be friendly relations.

Mr. Chairman, what is the real situation? Let us see if we can not take a dispassionate, calm view of this matter. The Appropriation Committee reports in its bill, now under discussion under the five-minute rule, the sum of $50,000, to carry out the provisions of section 20 of the Hepburn railroad rate law, relative to the appointment by the Interstate Commerce Commission of "special agents or examiners who shall have authority, under the order of the Commission, to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by such carriers." Certainly no one would contend, if the common carriers of the country and the Interstate Commerce Commission had practically agreed as to how the books and accounts of the railroads should be kept and how the reports should be made, that special examiners and agents should be, at heavy and useless expense, sent to examine these railroads.

Let us look on the matter from the standpoint of common sense and conservatism. I concede, of course, to gentlemen differing with me, sincerity. We are not enemies of the railroads, We are not unfriendly to corporations, and I say that the spirit of the whole Hepburn law, as I understand it, from the very beginning of the discussion until it was closed in the conference report, is that of conservatism, fair dealing, and honest treatment of the public corporations of this country. I believe now, Mr. Chairman, under the influence of the Hepburn law that the railroads and the people are reaching a better understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is to make the appropriation $350,000—that is, $300,000 more than the Appropriations Committee recommended. The amount of $50,000 follows on prudent, careful lines, but the increase proposed is in the nature of a "leap in the dark." No one would like to see the provisions of this rate law become a dead letter on the statute books for want of an appropriation to enforce its terms. There is no such danger as that. I say I am an earnest advocate of the Hepburn railroad law and an earnest advocate of making the railroads of the country, the common carriers, discharge their duties to the public—thoroughly so; but, Mr. Chairman, the time has not come with me, and I hope it never will, that I will go so far, as an extremist, as to do wrong and injustice to the railroads and at the same time injure the public in their interests by stimulating and encouraging an inspection that will advance no one's interest. Now, this section 20 says:

That the Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act, to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions, etc.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in compliance with the agreement with twenty-five prominent railroad men, appointed by the Association of American Railway Accounting Officers, have submitted a circular, and they say they have tentatively complied with the circular and they are proceeding on that line.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. You did not get the full import of that report. That is a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission made on the 19th day of December of last year, in which they report that they and the railroads have tentatively come to an agreement as to the manner of keeping accounts and books.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. The Interstate Commerce Commission says, in its report on this subject, as indicated by the gentleman from Georgia:

> After consultation with a subcommittee of this general committee, the Commission, through its representative, issued a circular calling attention to the necessity of such an extension of the classification of operating expenses as would represent the best American practice in this branch of accounting, special attention being called to certain specific points respecting which detailed information was required. The replies to this circular indicate that the questions submitted had been studied with care by all the important lines of the country, and their answers portrayed, not only what current American practice in fact is, but what it should be in order to serve most perfectly the interests of all concerned. It was upon the basis of these replies, and after extended conference with the representatives of the railways, that a tentative revision of the classification of operating expenses has been worked out. This will be submitted to all persons interested for consideration and advice before the classification is finally adopted and promulgated by the Commission.
> It is not necessary to proceed further in a detailed statement of the work already done under the twentieth section of the act to regulate commerce, as amended. In general, it may be said that the same method of procedure will be followed in regard to all branches of accounting as was followed in the case of the revision of the classification of operating expenses. The result of this will be that the system of railway accounting finally adopted will not express the ideas of any particular set of accountants, but will be, in fact, the crystallization of the views of all who, from experience or study, have a right to an opinion on so intricate a problem.

That is full and complete. Why should we go on and create a large number of experts and inspectors when we are making this experiment, when the Interstate Commerce Commission, which gentlemen praised so highly—and they are deserving of that praise—state there is a tentative agreement now between the railroads of the country and the Interstate Commerce Commission about all this? And in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, another very important paragraph of this report of the Interstate Commerce Commission is as follows:

> From the above it is evident that the uniform system of railway accounting which the Commission has undertaken to establish is not limited by bookkeeping considerations; on the contrary, it comprehends the use to be made of the compilations which such a system of accounts renders possible. The best fruit of correct accounting is correct statistics, and without correct accounting according to uniform classification and definition it is not possible to arrive at satisfactory statistical results. This part of the task delegated by the twentieth section, as amended, has not as yet been taken up in any formal manner.

That part of the work the Commission declared had not been touched at all, nothing had been done with it, yet these gentlemen would say in the most earnest, excited manner, "You must not stand on $50,000, but we demand $350,000." It seems to me that the Commission ought to know. Do not they know, when they are speaking in such emphatic and earnest terms as that, that if the $50,000 does not answer the purpose, when Congress meets in December, if the amount appropriated—$50,000—is insufficient, that it will be reported and provision will be made for a sufficient amount to carry out the inspection part of the law?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that this great Commission will throw the money away or waste it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman be given a minute to answer that question—well, five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire more time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Only one minute, so that I may answer the question. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] for his offer to extend my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee repeat his question? I failed to catch it fully.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My question is, Does the gentleman from Alabama think that this great Commission will throw this money away or only use so much of it as is necessary?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, no; I do not think that. I have confidence in the ability and integrity of the Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not the gentleman vote to give $500,000 to enforce the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman did not vote for it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I misunderstood the gentleman from Tennessee. Of course I voted the amount to enforce the Sherman antitrust law, and would do so again. But this, Mr. Chairman, is a different proposition. It certainly is not my purpose to say anything in the world against the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am following what the Commission has said in its report. The Interstate Commerce Commission has appeared frequently before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and asked us to do things that we did not do—asked our committee to make amendments that we have not yet made.

We thought we were there for the purpose of exercising our own judgment, and, as I said in the beginning, there are a great many amendments now pending to this Hepburn law, and I think it behooves the Congress of the United States to proceed in this matter of amendment most conservatively, not act upon it until possessed with knowledge of the facts and not make mere experiments. If a larger appropriation is needed and necessary to carry out the provisions of the rate law under discussion, after it has been demonstrated that the same was wise and judiciously used and was insufficient to carry out the purposes of the law, then for one I will vote to make the appropriation sufficient for all lawful purposes. The country, I think, expects Congress to be prudent, just, and fair to the common carriers of the country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I was a good deal interested and somewhat amused at the arguments of my eloquent friends, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], against the pending amendment, because, as they declared, it is an effort to enlist an "army of inspectors" for the purpose of spying upon one of the great business interests of the United States. One gentleman said, I think it was the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], that he was opposed to having an "army of inspectors" spying upon the "honest manhood" of America, having reference, of course, to the management of the railroads, as this amendment relates simply to railroads. And yet there is not a great railroad corporation in the United States but that has as large an "army of inspectors" and detectives in its employ as could possibly be hired under the paragraph of the bill we are now considering. These railroad corporations employ detectives and inspectors to spy upon their employees.

They follow brakemen to their homes, they follow switchmen to their homes, they follow other employees to their homes, to see that nothing is stolen from the cars; and yet the great majority of the employees of the railroads of the United States are as honest as is the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] or myself. They are a part of the "honest manhood" of the Republic, but the railroads of the country do not hesitate to put detectives on them. Why? Every man of sense can answer the question without my replying to it. It is because of the fact that while the great majority of the people in the employ of the railroad companies are honest, some of them, if strongly tempted, may prove to be dishonest.

So also is it with the rest of mankind, including railroad managers; a large majority are law-abiding and honest, others, when tempted, are law-defying and dishonest.

The Government of the United States is determined under the Hepburn interstate-commerce act to put a stop to rebates, and to see that the shippers of the United States have their rights protected. One thing that is necessary to be taught with great thoroughness in the United States to a certain class of people is the monstrous iniquity of rebates. Some men do not seem to realize how outrageous it is for a railroad to give rebates, to make one man rich and another man poor. A railroad is a monopoly of transportation which men must patronize or go out of business, just as the post-office is a monopoly of postal facilities that all men in business must patronize.

Suppose a postmaster were to sell postage stamps to one man at 2 cents and compel another man to pay 10 cents.

That very discrimination by the Post-Office Department would lead to the enrichment of some people in the United States and the comparative impoverishment of their competitors in business. In my home city are corporations that use $40,000 worth of 2-cent stamps a year—one of them about $60,000 worth. What if the United States Government were to permit the postmasters at that city to sell a certain number of 2-cent stamps to one of these corporations for $60,000 and the same number of stamps to a competitor for $15,000? In these days of intense competition that difference of $45,000 in the cost of postage stamps might represent the margin of profit in that particular business.

The United States Government can not—dare not—tolerate such discriminations and thus enable officials at their pleasure to enrich one man and impoverish another. Yet this is exactly what is done when the Government permits railroads to grant rebates. And for men to sneer at or to treat lightly the declaration that the people have determined that rebates shall stop and justice be done to all the shippers of the United States makes me think——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It makes one think that the man who sneers does not understand the enormity of the offense. A railroad official who gives a man a rebate ought to go to the penitentiary.

Neither the giving nor the taking of a rebate requires any particular business ability. The greatest commercial business ability in the United States can be crushed into helplessness by the competition of mediocre ability if only the mediocrity be given a monopoly of railroad rebates.

The Government can not stop rebating unless it has opportunity to inspect the books of the railroad companies. This amendment proposes that the Government shall have such opportunity. That is all.

The clause of the bill under consideration appropriates only $50,000, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], in response to my inquiry, said that he thought $2,500 a year would employ inspectors.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that Mr. Adams said that $2,500 is what they propose to pay.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to say that they were to get $2,500.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The highest price they estimate for, the highest-priced man on the roll, is $2,500.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Two thousand five hundred dollars strikes me as nothing at all in the way of a salary if we wish to get men competent to inspect the books of these great companies. The complaints because of defalcations in national banks have been very largely due to the failure of the inspection service. An illustration of this is found in the case that I cited a few minutes ago, where a bank was reported sound, and yet within two weeks it was discovered that at the time this report was made the cashier had already embezzled more than a million and a quarter of dollars of the bank's funds.

The gentleman from Ohio made a statement deserving attention, to the effect that the great Western country had been opened up and the people there made happy because somebody built railroads to them. The men who constructed the Pacific railroads never invested a dollar in them. The bonds of the United States, together with the first-mortgage bonds of the railroad, issued on land granted by the Government, paid every dollar of the cost.

There are many honest railroad men in the country; some of them are my personal friends; but though they be honest, yet in transactions in which the Government is interested their acts should be subject to Government inspection. There is not a great business concern but that has men acting as inspectors. There is not a great dry-goods house but has its special detectives. Why, then, is this proposition denounced as an effort to enlist "an army of inspectors" to spy upon "American manhood?" I really think that there is nothing whatever of reason or argument in that statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me. The gentleman has made repeated statements as to what I have said and which I did not say and is now proposing to treat as contemptible something I said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not contemptible.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is assuming to inspect and protect the different railroads and business establishments. Will he tell the House what railroad or what establishment of any kind proposes to absolutely examine and oversee on the theory that the employee is not going to do his duty—every employee that it employs?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, all the great dry-goods establishments have them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not one.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In all the large dry-goods stores the floorwalkers attend to the customers, but at the same time they see that the employees attend to their business. This is not a proposition to employ an "army of inspectors," and nobody knows that better than does the very able gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for one minute more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just a word about the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and corroborated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], that at the beginning, in the matter of safety appliances, and so forth, there was a very small appropriation, which has since considerably increased. There is no analogy between the legislation concerning safety appliances and the pending amendment to appropriate funds for inspectors to examine books. Safety appliances are something which anybody can see. I can tell by walking along a railroad track, and so can anybody else, whether air brakes are attached to the train; but the books of railroad companies are kept privately, in secret, and the Government of the United States can not tell whether its laws are being evaded unless there is a thorough inspection of the books.

The $50,000 proposed by the bill would not provide for a thorough inspection of the books of the companies owning the thousands of miles of railroads in this country, and therefore I shall vote for the pending amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Hepburn law covers about twelve pages of the Statutes at Large. Section 20 of that law covers about two pages. The only portion of section 20 which is in mind to-day is as follows:

> The Commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by carriers subject to this act, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed and approved by the Commission, and it may employ special agents or examiners who shall have authority under the order of the Commission to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by such carriers.

Amidst the manifold things done by the Hepburn law, the Commission was authorized to require reports, to prescribe a uniform system of bookkeeping, and was given authority in its discretion to examine the books and accounts of the railroad companies. If Congress had had a settled purpose that all the books of the railroad companies were to be constantly examined, the language would naturally have been—

> And it shall from time to time examine the books of the companies.

The statute is permissive, and it is therefore largely within the discretion of the Commission as to how often and how far these books shall be examined, limited only by the money placed at the disposal of the Commission for that purpose.

When this law was enacted the total appropriations for the Interstate Commerce Commission for the general discharge of all its duties, aside from the salaries of the Commissioners and the secretary, was $290,000. This bill carries for these general purposes $700,000; so that since the passage of the Hepburn law the annual appropriation for the general execution of this law will have been increased $410,000 a year if this bill carries.

Every dollar of this $700,000, composed of this $290,000 and this $410,000, is available for the very purposes under discussion here to-day. For all other authorized expenditures, aside only from the salaries of the Commissioners and the secretaries, the Commission is authorized to expend $700,000 in this year, an increase over last year's appropriation of more than $96,000. The Hepburn law became a law in June, 1906, and for the enforcement of all of its provisions this bill carries, in round numbers, $150,000 more than any bill passed by Congress upon this subject. Has there been such a change in the last year that it can be well contended that this committee is not dealing generously with this Commission? We want this law enforced in its every part, but the question is, How much does this Commission need for the purpose of enforcing this law? The bill as reported from this committee carries $98,500 for the Interstate Commerce Commission, or, in round numbers, a million dollars reported by this committee for the enforcement of the interstate commerce law in its every part. It is true that we specifically provide that they shall have this $50,000, but the language of the statute is such that they are entitled to use each and every part of the $700,000 for this same purpose. The language of the bill is—

> To further enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce compliance with section 20 of the act—
> And so forth—
> Fifty thousand dollars.

Seven hundred thousand dollars to enforce every part of the act, and to further enable it to enforce one section, $50,000 more.

(The time of Mr. SMITH of Iowa having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. TAWNEY, it was extended ten minutes.)

Mr. POLLARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield, although I would rather, after this, proceed until I have concluded.

Mr. POLLARD. I want to ask the gentleman whether the effect of inserting this paragraph on page 20 will not be to limit the amount to be used for this purpose to $50,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I answer the gentleman unqualifiedly, no.

Mr. POLLARD. Then why do you particularize and say that they shall use $50,000 a year if they can use the whole $750,000?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Because of the fact that a supplemental estimate was put in. They said to us upon the hearing that they would be equally pleased to have whatever went in go under the old heading, but this is put in to further enable them to execute section 20. Now, that distinctly implies that the other money is available for the enforcement of section 20 along with every other provision in the act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman says this $750,000 is all available for this purpose. Does not that money have to be used for other purposes? Are there not other employees to be paid, and is there not other machinery for which the money must be expended?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. During the past year a large force has been engaged in installing this uniform system. That is complete. Not only that, but this item of $700,000 is increased substantially $100,000 over last year, and to that extent the money can not have been used for other purposes. So that there is more than $100,000 of the $700,000 that has not been heretofore enjoyed by this Commission. When a committee reports a million dollars for the enforcement of one law, to say that that evidences that the committee does not want that law enforced is absurd.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, will the gentleman be fair about it with the House——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have been fair, and I resent the intimation that I have not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean to imply that you have not, but I want a fair question answered fairly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have answered fairly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I decline to answer any gentleman who propounds a question with the insinuation that I have not answered fairly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I made no insinuation and I meant none, but I want the information. The gentleman implies that the increase of $100,000 in the other items is not necessary for the carrying on of the other service.

Now, I ask the gentleman to tell the House why the Appropriation Committee increased their appropriation $100,000, and whether it was done to carry out this item?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say that an increase has been granted every year from the $290,000 up to $700,000 for the purpose of enforcing all the provisions of this new law, as well as those of the old law, and there is no showing, as far as I know, of any special need for this additional $100,000, except the general growth of the business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish the gentleman would answer my question directly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have answered it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the evidence brought before the committee, it increased the other item $100,000 for the purpose of carrying——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just as much for this item as any other. There was no other reason indicating any special purpose, but the work of this Commission has been growing as the result of the passage of the Hepburn law, and to cover all the growth of this business this additional $100,000 was given, as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did not the committee appropriate the $50,000 for the sole purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 20?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As an additional appropriation for this section, not to be devoted to anything else. Heretofore they have been using it out of the other appropriation. Everything done in the way of prescribing uniform bookkeeping, everything that has been done in the way of prescribing for annual and monthly reports, everything of every kind and character that has been done under section 20 of the Hepburn law has been done under this appropriation carrying $700,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman state how much money appropriated heretofore has been used?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not tell.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I should prefer to finish my remarks, as my time is limited, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the Commission succeeded in doing the work that is to be done?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Commission has succeeded in doing a large portion of the work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has it done all the work?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not devote my time to answering questions of that kind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But that is the main question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is for the gentleman from Tennessee to determine in his own mind. When this law was passed, the question of how often and how frequently the Interstate Commerce Commission should examine these books was left to be governed and controlled only by the amount of money at their disposal. There was no policy of Congress announced as to whether this was to be a constant inspection, or an occasional inspection, or when the Commission suspected something was wrong. If this was to be an inspection only when the Commission at least suspected something was wrong, then this full appropriation of $350,000 could not be justified. But even if we ultimately examined and audited every book of every railroad in the country, it seems to me that to initiate the work by attempting to employ in one day a force of 285 men competent to go over all the books of these railroad companies would be a great blunder, and that is exactly what the Commission said they wanted to do; they wanted the pay for the whole 285 men for the entire year. This $700,000, that they have been spending under this section, and the $96,000 added, and the $50,000 carried specifically, are all available for the organization and the initiation of this inspection service. It is more than abundantly sufficient, in my judgment, for the work in its infancy, because if this bureau is organized at one time by the employment of 285 men it will be a badly organized bureau, with a bad personnel.

Reference was made a little while ago to the fact that we give $100,000 for inspectors under the safety-appliance law. We started that with $15,000 a year, and increased it from year to year as the business grew. If we are to go into this system of general scrutiny of all the books of all the railroads in the United States, we ought to go about it by organizing a reasonable sized force, and developing that force until it is capable of discharging that duty.

A hastily organized force of the magnitude proposed would be inefficient and unsatisfactory in every respect.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CHANEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if this $50,000 is simply to be added to the amount before appropriated, would not the whole difficulty be remedied by simply increasing that amount, for has not this difficulty arisen from the fact that this additional amount was expressed as though for a different purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not. I think if there had been put in there $750,000 for the enforcement of the law, the same complaint would be made because we did not make it a million and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Commission itself did not include in the annual estimates anything for that service except that it was included under the general estimate. They subsequently sent in a supplemental estimate, and they themselves did not know anything about it or did not send in the supplemental estimate until about two months ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa a question? Does the gentleman mean to argue to this House that if this bill passes as it is recommended by the committee the Interstate Commerce Commission would be warranted in expending one cent more than $50,000 for this particular purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can say that in my judgment the Interstate Commerce Commission would not only be authorized to do so, but that it could expend the $50,000, that it could expend all that it has been expending for the enforcement of the twentieth section of the Hepburn-Dolliver Act, and that it could assign to that purpose as much as it saw fit of the increase of $96,000 of the same item, and I have no doubt that that is both the law and the interpretation of it.

Now, I am not inclined to cavil with the irresistible tendencies of our times, but it is a remarkable thing that in former days we had constables and sheriffs to enforce all State law, and marshals and police to enforce all city laws, and marshals to enforce all Federal law, but in our day we are building up a force of officers to enforce each specific law, and finally in this bill we reach the strange proposition that we are to create forces of special officers to enforce special sections of special laws. For the first time we are creating a force to execute a single section of the interstate-commerce law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. The gentleman speaks of the old methods of investigating offenses. Now, the United States grand juries in all the different circuits of the United States can investigate violations of this law, can they not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not unaided. I do not think they could wholly unaided.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. They can investigate, can they not, by calling agents and the witnesses and the private parties who complain?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. They have this additional agency.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly; but it does seem to me that an agent to enforce the interstate-commerce law ought to be enough, without getting down to agents to execute specific sections.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, why did the committee provide for a specific appropriation for this thing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. At the request of the Commission. I personally disapprove of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have a system of what we call "espionage" in enforcing the customs laws, have we not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I did not speak about espionage.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where they open everybody's trunk.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to say.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman allow me at least five minutes to reply to some of the arguments that have been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has had a privilege extended to him that has been extended to no other Member of the House—of completing his remarks.

The motion is not debatable.

Mr. TAWNEY. I insist on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that debate be now closed.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 53, noes 52.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, if there is going to be a demand for tellers, I will change that motion and move that all debate close in five minutes and the gentleman from Michigan have those five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman moves that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in five minutes and the gentleman from Michigan be allowed those five minutes. Without objection, the motion will be considered as having been agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can enlighten the committee on this proposition by anything more that I may say, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the various arguments that have been made against this amendment, and I must confess they have been varied and most inconsistent.

Gentlemen from the committee were very jealous of their reputation, fearing that anything I might have said would have reflected upon them, but as the discussion has progressed they have become exceedingly vulnerable. The opposition has assumed a twofold aspect before the Committee of the Whole House. Gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee loudly proclaim their loyalty to the commerce law and say they are willing to appropriate sufficient money to carry out the provisions of that law, but they insist that their interpretation of the statutes shall be the one for which appropriation shall be made. I object to their interpretation. It robs section 20 of all practical benefit.

I have insisted, Mr. Chairman—and I think I have with me the unbiased opinion of the majority of this House—that it was intended by the enactment of section 20 of the act of 1906 not only to provide for a uniform system of keeping accounts to provide for reports that would give the Commission the information which the Government had the right to demand, but it also imposed the necessary duty of seeing that those provisions were carried out. I submit that simply because you impose a penalty that does not mean an enforcement of the law. That will not be disputed. I have great faith in the gentleman from Iowa, and I have always admired his candor and his ability, but it seems to me that in the heat of debate he has given the wrong impression to this House when he says that the $700,000 carried in this bill can be used for enforcing the twentieth section of the law.

The $50,000 is a segregated item, and that alone could be used for the purpose stated. It is possible that some of the $700,000 could be used for this purpose, but it would be contrary to the spirit and intent of the act, and the gentleman and his committee would condemn it if it were done, because it has provided that the Commission, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the twentieth section, may expend $50,000. It is stated in express terms. Furthermore, the $700,000 is appropriated, according to the estimates, for other purposes, else the committee has not done its duty, and those estimates provide for the other things to be done under the law, and the Commission understands that the $50,000 only can be expended for the one particular purpose.

Mr. Chairman, we have reached that point, it seems to me from the discussion, and I base it upon what gentlemen themselves say, when we are going to provide for the enforcement of the interstate-commerce law as written in the statute books, as interpreted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the President of the United States, and, I believe, by this House, or we are going to confine it to the notion of a few gentlemen who do not believe that the railroads can do dishonest things or that they are in such a condition that we ought to have inspection reports, when, in case after case, their usual reports have been found to be false and unjust to the people. Mr. Chairman, I feel deeply on this question because it occurs to me that the present marks a vital moment in the history of legislation with reference to interstate and foreign commerce.

Can we afford at this time to weaken the Interstate Commerce Commission who have spent two years in developing a plan which they say will redound to the interests of the people of the United States? Can we afford at this time to stand against them by refusing to appropriate $300,000 more for carrying out a sane, intelligent, and well-considered plan for regulating the railroads of this country? Mr. Chairman, there are so many things that ought to be answered. The plan does not simply propose a method of auditing books, but it provides for obtaining information which shall come to the people of the United States for their benefit and for the good of honestly conducted railroads as well. Complaints will not come, and I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota, complaints have not come to the Commission of violations of the uniform-accounting system except through Government inspectors.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope in the interest of the enforcement of existing law that this added appropriation may be granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 79, noes 65.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided, and the tellers (Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. TOWNSEND) reported that there were—ayes 87, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Jacob Betzer (H. R. 1520, Fifty-ninth Congress), no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (S. 4289) for the relief of the people of Hartshorne, Okla., was changed from the Committee on Private Land Claims to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State submitting a formal communication from the States of Vermont and New York, made to the Government of the United States through the Department of State, to the end that the Federal Government may make provision for national participation in the proposed celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Lake Champlain.

As recommended by the Secretary of State, the memorial is laid before the Congress with a view to appropriate action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 30, 1908.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 20063 entitled "An act making appropriation to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia," with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Will the House disagree to the Senate amendments en bloc and ask for a conference with the Senate?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas any nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 242, nays 24, answered "present" 4, not voting 117, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 13.

Whereas the growth and spread of consumption or tuberculosis, commonly known as "the white plague," in some parts of the United States is becoming alarmingly prevalent; and

Whereas it is now generally accepted as a fact that this dread disease can be communicated from one person to another, by the healthy person inhaling the diseased breath of the consumptive, and also by inhaling dried expectorations carried by the wind; and

Whereas separation of the consumptively afflicted from the well and healthy is one of the best ways and means of preventing the spread of the disease and to benefit the ailing: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the legislative assembly of the State of Oklahoma, That the Government of the United States be requested and the United States is hereby requested to take early action looking toward the procurement by purchase or cession from the State of Texas in the arid regions thereof or Territory of Arizona a tract of land at least 18 miles square to be used for a consumptives' home and sanitarium. That the United States is hereby requested to reclaim said tract of land by wells or otherwise, so as to make the same productive, thereby affording the unfortunate an opportunity for profitable outdoor employment in the way of gardening, raising poultry, and engaging in other light enterprises to assist them in earning a competency and as an aid to mind employment at the same time.

That the United States be requested to cut said reserve into small tracts and to improve the same and to place the same in a cheerful homelike condition, as far as possible, in order that the unfortunate may find that relief that is awaiting him in the dry, recuperating, health-giving atmosphere of the dry regions above named.

MEMORIAL RELATIVE TO AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. OWEN presented the following memorial of the Hon. C. N. Haskell, governor of the State of Oklahoma, relative to amending the Constitution of the United States.

April 30, 1908.—Ordered to be printed.

To the Sixtieth Congress of the United States:

Whereas in the Constitution of the United States it was contemplated that lapse of time and changing conditions would necessitate amendments of and additions to the original document, and therefore the making of amendments and additions thereto were provided for;

Time has demonstrated that government by the people, of the people, and for the people can not be obtained by the present method of electing the upper House of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, therefore an overwhelming majority of the people of the entire United States have in various conclusive ways given evidence of their desire that the Constitution should be amended, to the end that United States Senators may be elected by direct vote of the people of the respective States, to the end that our Government in practice, as well as in theory, may justify the motto, "Let the people rule;"

Whereas government devised for the protection of life, liberty, and the right of property necessarily incurs the burden of taxation, direct and indirect; and

Whereas indirect taxation is far too often made an excuse for special privileges to a favored class and a burden upon the toiling masses of the United States; and

Whereas great estates and accumulations of property necessitate a greater share of supervision and expense to government; therefore it is fair and just that an income tax be authorized by the Constitution of the United States, affording a source from which a portion of the expense of government may be obtained, and to this end the Constitution of the United States should be so amended as to make the assessment and collection of an income tax constitutional;

Whereas it should be the policy of our Government to protect the toiling masses to the fullest degree of justice, in case of disability or death while in the service of interstate carriers and free from responsibility on account of the negligence of his fellow-servant or coemployee. It is therefore essential that the laws of Congress upon this subject should not be hampered or their validity endangered by the narrow provisions of the Constitution as at present. Distinct power should be given Congress to legislate as in its wisdom may fully protect the employee;

Whereas the conditions and necessities of the different States render it indispensable that each State have unrestricted the right to regulate the charges of common carriers and the conduct of transportation business and the right to prohibit the consolidation or combination or merger of competing carriers, to the end that reasonable competition shall not be destroyed; and

Whereas time has demonstrated that Federal control of this vast subject is inadequate to the needs of the States, and it being within the power and province of the State to regulate its internal affairs, this subject should have the emphasis of a direct provision in the Federal Constitution, not that the States have ever surrendered this right, but that judicial legislation may not further encroach upon the just rights and powers of the State;

Whereas it has always been the policy of free government to permit the people of the States, by their own voice (the majority controlling), to formulate and execute the laws for their local regulation, and where a State, by its people, have elected to prohibit the importation or use of any products affecting the morals and health of the community or the protection of its honest labor, by the exclusion of convict-made goods, the Federal Government should never aid or connive at the violation of such as has been declared to be the expressed will of the people of such State, to the end that doubt on this subject may be cleared away and a definite limit put upon legislation by our Federal judiciary, an amendment of the Constitution is essential.

AMEND THE CONSTITUTION.

There are two methods of securing the submission of amendments to the Constitution of the United States:

(a) The Congress of the United States may formulate and submit amendments on its own motion to the several States for the ratification, but as to this method the people of our country have waited long weary years in vain; but, with a last appeal to that method, the five articles proposed herewith are submitted for the voluntary action of our Congress.

(b) Wise, indeed, were those who framed the Constitution of our country, in the provision of another method for its amendment. In Article V it is provided that the several States, the source of all Federal power, may, by resolution of the legislative body, two-thirds of the States joining therein, and addressing such request to the Congress, make it mandatory upon the Congress of the United States to convene a convention of the States of the Union for the purpose of formulating any and all such amendments to the Federal Constitution as said convention, when assembled, may deem wise and proper, and the Congress shall also provide that all amendments proposed by such convention shall be submitted to the several States for ratification or rejection. It is to be hoped that Congress will not, by their failure to act, make necessary the delay and expense incident to such convention by refusing to submit the attached five articles and such additional articles as the people may demand by a reasonable representation of the people.

The action of twenty-seven States of the Union in requesting a convention of the States must impress the Congress that patience has almost ceased to be a virtue and that Congress has not listened with even diligence and justice to the source of all power—the people of our country.

Can there be any better evidence of the demand for a constitutional convention of the States than that expressed in the resolutions filed herewith, adopted by twenty-seven of our grand and glorious free States, following:

Pennsylvania, Indiana, Texas, California, Nevada, Missouri, Nebraska, Arkansas, Wyoming, North Carolina, Illinois, Colorado, Louisiana, Kansas, Montana, Wisconsin, Oregon, Michigan, Tennessee, Idaho, South Dakota, Washington, Utah, Kentucky, Minnesota, Iowa, and Oklahoma.

Of the nineteen remaining States, more than two-thirds of them stand ready to join with their sister States in this demand, awaiting only the convening of their legislative bodies.

Shall Congress defer longer the submission of these needed amendments to the Constitution when, by the States above named, substantially two-thirds of the population of the United States have united in a call for such a convention?

Shall the people have the opportunity to pass upon these questions without further hindrance or delay, or must a campaign be waged to remind Congress that it is the servant of a free and independent people?

The State of Oklahoma has created its commission and directed the presentation to Congress of the matters and things herewith, and humbly prays that the justice of these demands may appeal to the honorable Congress of the United States.

Respectfully,

C. N. HASKELL,
Governor and Chairman of the Oklahoma State Commission.

Whereas Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the House concurrent resolution No. 22.

Whereas under the present method of the election of United States Senators by the legislatures of the several States protracted contests frequently result in no election at all, and in all cases interfering with needed State legislation; and

Whereas Oregon, in common with many of the other States, has asked Congress to adopt an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and said amendment has passed the House of Representatives on several occasions, but the Senate of the United States has continually refused to adopt said amendments: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Texas (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby asked and urgently requested to call a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States as provided by Article V of the said Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That we hereby ask and urgently request that the legislative assembly of each of the other States in the Union unite with us in asking and urgently requesting the Congress of the United States to call a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to send a certified copy of this concurrent resolution to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the legislative assembly of each and every of the other States of the Union.

Whereas by direct vote of the people of the State of Illinois at a general election held in said State on the 4th day of November, A. Whereas we believe that Senators of the United States should be elected directly by the voters; and

Whereas to authorize such direct election an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is necessary; and Joint resolution No. 15.

Requesting Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which amendment shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Whereas a large number of the State legislatures have at various times adopted memorials and resolutions in favor of the election of United States Senators by popular vote; and

Whereas the National House of Representatives has on several occasions recently adopted resolutions in favor of this proposed change in the method of electing United States Senators which were not adopted by the Senate; and

Whereas, believing there is a general desire upon the part of the citizens of the State of Tennessee that the United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the house concur), That the legislature of the State of Tennessee favors the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote and joins with other States of the Union in respectfully requesting that a constitutional convention be called for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as provided for in Article V of said Constitution, which amendment shall provide for a change in the present method of electing United States Senators, so that they can be chosen in each State by direct vote of the people.

Whereas a large number of the State legislatures have, at various times, adopted memorials and resolutions in favor of the election of United States Senators by popular vote; and

Whereas the National House of Representatives has, on several occasions within recent years, adopted resolutions in favor of this proposed change in the method of electing United States Senators, which were not adopted by the Senate; and

STATE OF WYOMING.

Enrolled memorial No. 2, house of representatives, Wyoming.

Be it resolved by the third legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be memorialized as follows: The third legislature of the State of Wyoming respectfully represents to the honorable the Senate and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that they urge the submission of the constitutional amendments now pending in Congress requiring United States Senators to be elected by a vote of the qualified electors of the State.

They believe that the exciting and disturbing contest for seats in the legislature in many of the States has been owing in a great measure to impending contests for United States Senators.

In many States the sessions of the legislature are limited to a specified time, and much of this time has been wasted and consumed in a fruitless effort to elect Senators.

The temptation to corruption and the inducements to influence legislators by questionable means would be entirely removed if the election of Senators were transferred to the people. It is believed the business of the legislature should be confined to matters of legislation, and that the excitement attendant upon the selection of United States Senators by the legislature interferes to a great degree with that business. The growth of a public sentiment in this direction we believe to be grounded upon good reasons, calling for an amendment of the Constitution in this respect.

Resolved, That the governor be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, upon his approval of this memorial, to forward a duly authenticated copy thereof, under the great seal of the State, to the Senators and Representative in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

President of the Senate.

STATE OF NEVADA.

Senate concurrent resolution relating to the election of United States Senators by direct popular vote.

Whereas the people of this State, as shown by a vote taken thereon, favor an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct popular vote; and

Whereas it is evident that a large majority of the American people favor such an amendment, as shown by the tone of the public press and by the resolutions of the State legislatures of the various States and the resolution passed by the National House of Representatives; and

Whereas Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments thereto:

Resolved, therefore (if the assembly concur), That the legislature of the State of Nevada favors the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote, and respectfully requests that a convention be called for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as provided for in Article V of said Constitution, which amendment shall provide for a change in the present method of electing United States Senators, so that they can be chosen in each State by a direct vote of the people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State submitting a formal communication from the States of Vermont and New York, made to the Government of the United States through the Department of State, to the end that the Federal Government may make provision for national participation in the proposed celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Lake Champlain.

As recommended by the Secretary of State, the memorial is laid before the Congress with a view to appropriate action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 30, 1908.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I notice on the Calendar that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] intends to proceed with his remarks this morning. I will ask the Senator if he is ready to proceed and desires to do so.

Mr. DAVIS. I am; yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

SUPPRESSION OF TRUSTS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask to have the resolution which I introduced recently laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution at the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 28th of April, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and the same is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 100) to suppress pools, trusts, and combinations in trade and to provide penalties for violations of its provisions, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the resolution introduced by myself seeks to discharge the Judiciary Committee having in charge Senate bill No. 100, introduced by myself on the 4th day of December, 1907, from the further consideration of said they having failed to the Senate, and I ask that said bill be laid before the Senate for its consideration, and with the indulgence of the Senate, I shall give my reasons for such resolution, and that there may be no doubt as to the reasons given, and that no intemperate or unguarded language may escape my lips on this occasion, I have chosen to do that which I have never done before in my life—committed to writing the things of which I speak on this occasion.

Why shall this bill not be reported by the committee? Can any Senator of the majority give me a valid, intelligent reason? Does the bill not accomplish in legal effect the evil at which it is leveled, or is the majority, the Republicans in this Senate, just preceding the Presidential election, afraid to meet the issue before the American people involved in this bill, namely, the suppression of trusts, pools, and combinations in trade? Do they prefer to go before the American people in the coming contest, notwithstanding the fact that the President of the United States has insisted upon legislation along this line, with no bill passed, no legislative effort made looking to the relief of the people against this monstrous evil? I say to the majority to-day, however much they may dread the issue and however much they may delay it, it will not down. The people are demanding relief along this line, and, like Banquo's ghost, it will rise in the coming campaign and in coming years to fret you.

Except in so far as a proper discharge of public duty meets virtuous approbation, I have little ambition to attract attention to myself or to what I may do. To the importance of the present bill I therefore turn as an excuse, if excuse be needed, for venturing again so early in my career as Senator to consume the time of the Senate. And within the abounding virtues of that measure may I not hope to sink, at least for the time, whatever deficiencies I myself may personally possess; for, sir, even if mere applause were, under any circumstances, desirable for its own sake, still my own untrained abilities, when tested here, constantly warn me that only a plodding directness of speech, unadorned, is the unenvied lot to which alone by nature I am assigned. It is known to the Senate that my service upon this floor has just begun, nor would I seem to disregard your staid and dignified customs, or lack at all in respect for whatever usage has indicated as decorous and seemly. Under other circumstances I would yield to a natural inclination and defer addressing the Senate until time had matured my tenure of office; but I deem the bill now before the Senate too important, too vital to my country; delay, sir, would prove fatal to it. But for that, I should most likely defer to that long usage here which in some quarters has been thought needful as probatory for new Senators. My cause alone, then, I trust will acquit me of presumption. Indeed, Mr. President, earnestly devoted to what seems to be of transcendent importance to the people, Senators will not, I pray, believe me too forward if, indeed, I shall note conditions which provoke need of this measure. Not that I propose argument, or that argument is deemed necessary; none, absolutely none. The arguments, sirs, have all been made, all of them. Not here? Not in this Chamber? Ah! that asseveration may be true. As to that personally I do not know. Austere, staid, ultra-conservative, the Senate may not have given ear to all that has been heard, or all that is being resolved by and among those whose backs are straining and bending under the weight of Government.

Arguments, sir, indeed, which justify, aye, which demand the passage of effective antitrust legislation, are being made daily, hourly made throughout the land. Not in words, in gifted speech, not by leading statesmen and orators, no; most generally, no; not in classic rhythm or word vaporings always. All such, sir, for the most part, are against us. Here and there it is true, a brave soul cries from the watch towers and his great eloquence, like the voice of a bell at sea, is resonant, clear, and loud, amidst the befogged and rolling waters. But, sir, would you hear the muffled swish and sob of the undertow, hear the moan, the deepening roar, the fitful slash; hear the grinding, thudding beat upon dark and desolate shores? Ah, sir, in poverty, in unrequited toil throughout the land, conditions consequent upon discriminating laws, are the arguments made. Moreover, these are arguments within themselves, sir, which gifted speech can not turn. The sad plight of the people everywhere, in comparison with the unholy acquisitors of your policies, are arguments which storm the very citadel of national justice. I hope here to note only some of these conditions. The Senate, I hope, has not deemed me so vain as to attempt to offer anything new, or even to present old arguments more eloquently or otherwise in stronger or better lights. There is not only nothing original to be offered, but, Mr. President, to drone away time upon this floor in restating, upon the one hand, what all so well know, or, upon the other hand, by embarrassing this bill with tedious technical criticism, where crimes, red-handed, against decency itself, say nothing of the patient suffering of our people. My wish, therefore, at this hour is not argument, but action. Still, did I not believe such a course unnecessary I should attempt a detailed analysis of the measure; for, in my feebleness, I would attempt whatever is within the energies of man to strike down those causes which are grinding into dust all that is best in this Republic. But, sir, as I can see, detail is unnecessary. To pursue it would be so much time lost. The bill has been printed. Every Senator has had or may have had a copy of it. It has been upon every desk in this Chamber. Its terms are plain, simple, direct, and ample. And, too, all have read it or may read it unless there be those amongst us wholly given over to fiddling while torrents and tempests of fire deluge the streets of Rome. This bill, sir, is calculated to be most effective. But I challenge Senators to make issue upon any provision of it if anywhere it may be made better, pointing in good faith to its defects, if such there be. As to its salutary purpose, there can be no division of opinion. Directed, without ambiguity, against trusts and conspiracies which infest our commerce, evils, sir, that have sprung up, grown, and fattened under favor of Republican laws, impoverishing labor and robbing the farm of its annual substance, and dominating in all enterprise until liberty itself is stifled. I earnestly beseech Senators to lend to this measure most thoughtful attention.

Ah, sirs, it has been suavely suggested that the penalties proposed by this bill are unusual; that they are too severe. True it is that heavy fines are provided; true, it is intended to confine malefactors of the class defined by its terms in penitentiaries. For myself, sir, I see no objection to those provisions. Sensible, too, of the general tone and temper of this body, I can but hope that, as to this, no Senator can be found who does object. Ah, sir, upon what are such objections founded? The crime, what crime save treason itself more vitally threatens, not merely domestic felicity, but the security of free institutions? Trusts! Has any one been so bold as to deny that they, those who conceive and execute them, are robbing the people? Robbing, I say; and what, pray, is robbery? A thief is a thief, is he not, sir? These insolent predatories for years have surreptitiously filched from industry and labor indiscriminately until their aggregate booty runs far into the billions. Billions, sir, I repeat! Methuselah could not have counted it by dollars in twice his lifetime. Adam, indeed, had he survived till this day, and computing a thousand dollars every minute since his expulsion from Paradise, must have lived 50,000 other years to have completed the task. Let no one take alarm; these are conservative estimates. Upon what pretext, therefore, do we hear the word "severity" deftly connected with what is so justly proposed as punishment for so great a crime? No; let trusts and trust magnates be placed precisely upon the same level of infamy as other thieves; let them be punished with unerring certainty according to their crimes. Ah, what is the true significance of this deft suggestion? Whence comes it? Resting upon the false basis it does, the suggestion is an insult to intelligence and an affront to the spirit of American institutions. There is not and there can be naught in mere wealth, nothing in so-called "station in life" to excuse or palliate. What odds in "station," Mr. President, if one be an enemy to society, a felon in every moral aspect? Away, then, with considerations so unworthy of honorable men. A thief is a thief, and so, I affirm before all mankind, that trusts and trust promoters deserve the consideration which becomes thieves. "Station," "wealth," indeed!

If the poor steal, are not the poor punished? The hungry, the halt, the sick, who has excused from punishment these, although in extremity demands of humanity may sometimes force appropriation of the necessities of life? Yet this is a crime; for such is the law. Who, then, I ask, would soften the same punishment when it is proposed to visit it upon the rich thief, whose very crimes, indeed, have made him rich? Ah, Mr. President, my estimate of this body forbids the supposition that a single Senator may be found who is so sensitive, so blind to what is just, as that. There is no severity; the terms of the bill, in the light of criminal codes everywhere, are temperate and conservative. An ordinary horse thief is as severely punished in most of the States. Besides, sir, penitentiary walls, what terrors have they for honest men? And even those now guilty, they with all their booty, may, if they will, escape so horrible humility. If the rich and patrician would avert it, there is an easy road. Let them forego brigandage, abandon villainy; they have, then, but to seek forgiveness for the past before the throne of heaven.

That there are imperfections in this bill I do not question; but I am sure, if any, they are of a minor character, though I know of none. The best legislation, sir, must be perfected by trial and experience. Let the Senate enter upon a trial of this. It will at least begin what has been deferred far too long—so long, Mr. President, that not only has untold treasure been swept away forever, but that predatory wealth has become eminently perilous to the Republic itself. I beg the Senate, therefore, to pass this bill. Delay at this late day will prove most disastrous to it.

Procrastination will but afford its enemies time to fortify against it. Or do you wish to wait until the trusts themselves or their friends give to it their assent? They do not ask this bill. Naturally neither do their friends want it, and now there is nothing left to them, if it be not objection and obstruction. Secretly or more openly, all who are in sympathy with "high criminality" will object and obstruct. Less, the country does not expect. Naturally, furthermore, it will, I have no doubt, be their tactics by indirection to overthrow it. No one looks for open, doctrinal attack, though each day adding to their power and audacity, these giants in rapacity have grown most bold and daring. But we expect them, true to stealth, to adopt the surreptitious assault; to hear from them feigned professions of regard and love, seeking tenderly (?) only to cure by amendments, assumed defects. These, or similar methods, I am informed, are generally the resort of those who would strangle legislation proposed in the interest of the people. But, Mr. President, the trusts have no place in this Chamber; and shall we not refuse to be deceived by trust lobbyists and agents about this Capitol? Shall we cower or fear their taunts and jeers; tremble before their poisoning mouth or biting pen; shall we hide from the fury of their long-pampered pride? Ah, Senators, well you know that, laying wait for the halting and timid, is a debauched, mercenary press, who with false, but seductive or more dire and threatening, arguments heaped upon desks here, undertake to intimidate the American Senate. This bill, calculated as it is to bring untold blessings to the country and harmful to none, normally here, should be received with most general favor; for, sir, its principles, fundamentally comporting with the true American conception of liberty and justice, are infinitely above party, above partisan prejudice, and party policies.

I appeal to that intelligence and to those higher sentiments which have actuated men aforetimes when dire and appalling crisis had befallen humanity; aye, to that bond of brotherhood which individually in the silent hour provokes contemplation and awakens within us a sense of our obligations to God. At such times, within the experience of every man, however rich or exalted before the world, thoughts, as if apart or proceeding from voiceless speech somewhere within the mystery of our being, engages the mind with problems of human life, its relations, and its ends. Worldly pomp, glory, and power, effervescent; wealth, pageantry, resplendence, ambition—these, all these, sir, at such times turn to wormwood, and, as a sick child, we roll upon our pillow and cry for God. Then it is that the human heart exclaims, "What is all this worth!" Then it is, too, there comes a counter query, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" And, too, Mr. President, then it is to every man there comes but one reply. What? Every Senator bears me ample answer. Be your creed what it may, each experience exemplifies: We are bound indissolubly in a brotherhood whose fatherhood is God; and in the solitude of self-communion no man fails to apprehend that material conditions in so far as they disregard these principles inhere in evil and must decay. Sir, it behooves us here, not simply and only from official obligation, but from what is infinitely more binding, the imperative dictates of our common humanity to strike down the greedy despoilers of civic and domestic peace and tranquillity. The bill now before the Senate is a proposition to scourge the thieves from our temple. It proposes nothing more, and certainly nothing less will be offered or suggested. Yet, sir, if there is to be attack, spring it, I say to the trusts, in the open field and let us behold to whom the country shall point with the finger of contempt and scorn.

Ah, sir, conscious of its fullest meaning, I challenge open, direct attack, if there be enemies anywhere who have designs upon the life of this measure. Whence shall it come? Sir, I do not predict that it will come from within this Chamber, for Senators here represent the people. No Senator sits in the Senate under false color or false pretense. Your commission is, I know, directly under the seal of your general assembly, but your people are behind your general assembly. Whatever of technicality there may be against it, still, Senators, you represent your people; your only allegiance is to them. Moreover, I halt to say that time has demonstrated that you should in all good faith be elected directly by the people themselves. However that may be, you in fact represent only them. You wish it not declared, you dare not yourselves declare, that you hold allegiance to another master. Wherefore let this bill come to a vote. By our unanimity for such a bill put forever at rest any question of our fidelity to what is best for the masses in every quarter of this Union. In such a body as this, if guerrilla warfare from without be superinduced, honorable Senators all, it shall be spurned with contempt. This bill, then, must come to a vote. If, perchance, there be Senators whose principles require opposition to minor features of the measure, let such objection be made here; if finally the bill is to them objectionable, surely, sir, no objection can be so indefensible as not finally to be openly supported by the vote of such objectors. Upon a final vote on the bill, Mr. President, affecting, as it obviously does, the well-being of the whole people, any doubt may thus be expelled, if doubts anywhere exist, that a single Senator would hide from his constituents his true sentiments upon it. If such doubt there be, I devoutly trust that upon final submission that doubt will take wings and fly far away and be at rest.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FULTON. As the Senator is complaining of the Committee on the Judiciary in not reporting this measure, and his argument is simply to show the importance, I take it, of proceeding against combinations in restraint of trade, I suggest that he kindly tell us wherein his proposals differ from the existing law, the act of 1890, commonly known as the "Sherman Act."

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. It differs most materially in the penalties of the act. It proposes to put malefactors in the penitentiary.

Mr. FULTON. The only difference, then, is——

Mr. DAVIS. Not only that, sir, but it differs in many respects, if I could take the time of the Senate to point them out. The bill is upon my desk.

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator contend that the provisions of this bill would cover any combination in restraint of interstate commerce or interstate trade that is not fully and completely covered now by existing law?

Mr. DAVIS. I certainly do.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator indicate any particular act that his bill would cover that the existing law does not cover?

Mr. DAVIS. I will do so before I conclude.

Sir, I would dispel whatever of injustice toward the Senate may linger anywhere in the minds of the people. I defend the Senate against the charge of indirection. For myself, but an integral here, the whole world may know by my vote, as well upon all other as upon this question, what has been my ultimate decision and action.

Sir, the sinister arts of seductive agencies may hurl whatever of ridicule or of contumely for hindering and embarrassing legislation, but for one, this bill shall have my undismayed support, treading the wine press alone, if it be so decreed, one Senator if no more, here shall voice a conviction that humanity and justice are more to be prized than aggrandizement or glory. Thanks be to God, however, I shall not be alone. Without regard to party, there are others in this Chamber, tried and faithful, on either side, sir, who deeply realize the value of this legislation to the country. Devotion to the well-being of the people characterizes many independent minds amongst us irrespective of party, and however partisan when partisanry is the tug of war. I but send word of cheer and hope among the oppressed in every State when I proclaim, as I gladly do, that the breadwinners, those united toilers whose brain and brawn sustain this Republic, still have friends in the Senate of the United States. Whatever beliefs exist in any part of the country, I would defend from aspersion, unless truth be barred me, any or all Departments of the Government. Upon crucial exigencies I have faith that no Department will fail, that they, each and all, will prove in the critical hour, a most sincere and unbending adherent to public weal. I can not permit my mind to dwell upon the contrary, nor will I allow my thoughts to speculate concerning what may be the consequences of such improbable contingencies. Yet, popularly, sir, you may be not aware, this greatest of deliberative bodies has been likened in some of its important tendencies to the House of Lords of the British Parliament. Throughout this Republic the belief for years has steadily grown that the Senate has acquired a fixed bias against the people. Whatever legislation be proposed here which is designed justly to restrain the acquisition or the exaction of wealth, has been supposed very generally to enter upon a rocky road, meeting at last at your hands a melancholy doom.

I but state a fact, sir, when I say that the trusts, according to a popular belief, whatever the injustice to the Senate, are here peculiarly influential; that measures looking to reform in that behalf, that any legislative programme leveled against their predatory sway, is somehow and in some way summarily executed, court-martialed, drumhead court-martialed, sir, and shot upon the spot. And, Mr. President, in view of that erroneous belief I now ask what has been done, what is being done, or will be done?

Sir, as was so properly said by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] upon the question of the building of four battle ships, this Congress will go down in history as the most extravagant Congress that ever assembled on the American continent. He said that there was the largest deficiency in the Treasury to-day that had ever existed.

Ah, Mr. President, I pause to say that when the people of this great nation ask of Congress bread, they give them a stone; when they ask of Congress a fish, they give them a serpent. What have you done at this session for the amelioration of the condition of the toiling masses of this country? You have passed one bill, the employer's liability act, which is as full of holes as a kitchen sifter; a bill, sir, that the President thought so little of that for days and days he threatened its veto. Ah, Mr. President, well may it be asked what has been done to reassure the public mind or to dispel these vain beliefs. For, however far from the facts, a condition confronts the Senate. People in all ages have been swayed by their beliefs, however fanciful or elusive. Human nature is what it is; but great will be our error if we rest upon a belief, equally false or elusive, that the people found their beliefs wholly upon either passion, ignorance, or prejudice.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FULTON. Before the Senator passes from the employers' liability act, which he has denounced in such strong terms as being full of deficiencies and defects, will he not kindly point out the particular point wherein it is unconstitutional?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not intend that this discussion shall be diverted from the question under consideration. If the Senator from Oregon desires me to teach a law school and if he will kindly indicate that desire, I will be glad to have him as a pupil. He himself, sir, well knows that the employers' liability act is but a sop thrown out to the American laborer just preceding a Presidential election.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator asks do I want him to teach a law school. I ask him to teach only me. Before we are asked to enter upon that broader field, I should like to see whether or not he really understands the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not mean to be disrespectful to the Senator, but I do not care to have the discussion diverted at this time. True, the public mind is not invariably judicial; it does not wait upon demonstration, or demand that evidence be orderly, circumstantial, or particular. Men in all the more serious affairs of life form opinions as frequently upon what does not as upon what does transpire. The Senate is judged in large part by what it has not accomplished. So, sir, I say let popular judgment be founded never so erroneously, want of confidence in this body is the fact to which all must give heed. Ah, just now there comes from "captains of industry" a specious plea that "want of confidence," that this element alone, want of confidence in business stability precipitates a panic; that within the twinkling of an eye what was full and fat became lean and poor; that so vital to prosperity is mere confidence of the people that to withdraw that confidence is to convulse enterprise with disorder and bring to ruin in a day the mighty fabric of business and commerce. As to that I now take no issue.

But, Mr. President, what then are we to understand is the nature or value of confidence? Can you say "confidence" is substantive, a thing which may be owed, borrowed, or loaned; a tangible quality inhering in all things, if they are to have consistency, cohesion, and durability? Or, sir, is that subtle agency something less or more; will you rank it among the mechanical or vital forces, so precipitate and dreadful are its effects, buoying by its favor, or destroying in cyclonic fury by a nod, universal prosperity? Moreover, whatever be the constituents or the caprices of "confidence," none have supposed it capable of extension or withdrawal, unsupported, and at will. Repeating, therefore, I ask what has the Senate done to restore the confidence among the people? What of want of confidence in the Senate? What ere long will that precipitate? Mr. President, the Senate must be judged, has been judged, will be judged as other men generally are judged, by their actions, by nonaction, by their sympathies and associations. I repeat again, sir, that the Senate is confronted by a condition. It may not be just. Upon the whole, I am persuaded that it is unjust. But persuasion of others do not meet what the Senate must meet for itself. Nor, indeed, can we longer fold about us the silent dignity, a self-consciousness of innocence, and ignore this condition. Suavely attribute it in silence to ignorance or prejudice? No; that will not do; something more must now be done. This, sir, is a representative body. While there may be a just loftiness appurtenant to our place here, Senators can not forget nor treat with contempt the political truth that we are but servants of the people, and, what is more, that our masters hold our conduct under suspicion. Deny, again and again, that trusts have peculiar influence upon this floor? Denial is proper within itself, comporting as it does the truth, but denial alone, unattended with something more substantial and demonstrable, will wander back unladen, a vagrant echo from the mountains of discontent. Denial, sir, is no longer open as an efficient remedy. Denial has been sent forth year after year, but not one has found where to rest its feet. Moreover, now, everywhere the flood does not abate. Upon the contrary, discontent is rising, mountain peaks are disappearing, landmarks are submerged. Most alarming of all, over the whole sky a dismal pall warns us of impending torrents. Sir, believe me, there must be action. I pray God most earnestly that the Senate be up and doing. Act for the people, not in excitement, not suddenly in fright, but let what is done be decently done, promptly and amply.

Mr. President, let no Senator, from what has been said, receive misunderstanding as to my own temper or sentiments. Aye, sir, if denial be worth anything, I deny the direct influence upon this body of predatory wealth. Such denial, during my short experience here, has been in many ways confirmed. No, sir; if the trusts have influence in the Senate Chamber, that influence is not direct; whatever at all there may be of that influence, I feel that it can be only consequential and remote. So it is to be reflected that we are but men. I do not say that Senators chosen by the people to so great an office are, as respects character and virtue, even ordinary men, yet men, after all, possessed, too, it is fair to assume, of the weakness, the fears, the temptations, and hopes of other men. If, therefore, unworthy influences have had effect here to stay legislation, there are still peculiar conditions which render Senators generally—and I doubt if there be a single exception—wholly insensible to it. It must be remembered where we are and what relation this body bears to commerce and to all that pertains to public good. Who can affirm that environment is a condition which, if regarded at all, may be set apart as separate from ourselves. Insensibly, sir, whatever we are or hope to become, is referable directly or broadly to environment. And, surrounded as we are by the allurements of luxury, seeing hourly the scintillations and glitter of wealth, it need not be doubted that public servants are made the objects of its enticements. Devotees of Mammon, ever ready to afford gayety without stint, their arts for entertainments are unrivaled, while bewitching smiles all the while plausibly disarm fear. Prodigal liberality is their stock in trade, appealing to the natural appetites of man, and, sir, as the country well knows, this capital city is overflowing with seductive measures, which, although failing often to enthrall, are designed to ensnare the stoutest heart. Thus daily surrounded, some men are borne unconsciously, as in a dream, upon angel wings.

Exhilarated by that inexplicable effluvium characteristic of pageantry and pomp, the mind passes rapidly through increasing stages of intoxication, the heart glows, the head rings with subdued, though altogether pleasurable sounds, while the victim sinks painlessly, if not joyfully, into a sort of stupefaction. Among the first effects of this condition upon the mind is forgetfulness. Singularly, what of the past has to the victim been true and real, now is apprehended only as a dream. Home, faces of the confiding people—all these; pledges at the hustings, duty, honor, valor, devotion, justice, law, float aimlessly, as dispersing clouds, and if seen at all, are seen only as far away and unreal. It, sir, is the hypnotism of worldliness—the spell of wealth. At every turn now wily incantations of Mammon enwrap the attention; there is no longer either desire or opportunity for escape, and the poor, weak creature, in a sort of frenzied gladness, falls down in hopeless idolatry. These conditions are ever present about many great capitals, seen of all men. Approach Senators directly? No. Not that the trusts would not, did not the honor of the Senator warn them that they dare not. Sir, assured thus of the rebuke which must follow direct approach, a system infinitely removed and wholly metaphysical is adroitly woven around the habitat of legislation. "Necromancy," "hypnotism," sir, is the better, and more nearly the word. It is the hypnotism of wealth. By its exquisite agency, though neither the person nor the honor is harmed, the will is unconsciously controlled.

But let me hasten to more substantial things. Mr. President, who does not know that American Government originated out of bitter hostility to those very principles which to-day seem under its administration to thrive, while liberty and justice themselves wither and die? I deny that any there be who deliberately refuse to see. No; but blind are they rather, so constant and fierce has been the glow of gold. Ah, no one is now assuming the authority of a Moses, but I bid the Senate hearken to a discontent which is daily growing more ominous. "Brazen serpent," say you, "without virtue?" Yes, I appeal to the Senate. Look! Else, sir, as God lives the Republic must perish. Inevitable it is. If it be destiny, call it destiny; but be assured, Senators, that except we return to righteousness national life must terminate in nation dissolution. If truth be truth, there is no escape. Ever widening the chasm between capital and labor, bitter fruits of national legislation, this Congress must span quickly and well, else soon within that dismal abyss will tumble in conglomerate hopelessness the cracking and creaking walls of this Republic. Ah, well I know how ready some may be to cry "Prophet! Prophet!" in mockery and disdain. In the self-same spirit which the Hebrews, upon a far different occasion, scoffingly cried: "All hail, King of the Jews!" Life, sir, has its own laws. Fundamentally righteousness and justice, infinitely varied in forms, are its essential remonstrance. All else is death. Ye can not escape. In the all of the one is life; beyond, Mr. President, death stalks, stern, remorseless, and solitary through halls where laughter has not entered, and silence, in sabled stiffness enshrouds oblivion. Be warned, I say, Senators, Federal policies must be swiftly reformed. Sir, the time is propitious, and here and now, putting aside party interest and feeling, let the Senate for proof turn in retrospection upon this Government. Its original designs you know full well, you know its history. Federal Union—Union of free States in America! Sir, when first proclaimed that glory palsied the heart of Europe, ashen were the lips of monarchy in alarm, and then and there plutocracy furtively indited its last will and testament.

Providential resolution had crowned liberty, and American valor sworn allegiance to justice. Here, home of the free, there was constituted a safe haven for every craft, ocean liner or smack, that should be dashed unequally amidst the reefs of human struggle. Behold to-day that Government, not as now, but in the beginning. History, sir, will tell the story. Ah, some may accuse me, if they choose, of academics, but what of history if from history, in times like the present, we may not again take our bearings, so violently have greed and glory driven us. Look, then, I beg, at this Republic in the earlier lights; see her unimpaired splendor unfurled before the world an unconquerable spangle of stars; behold her unrivaled grace in the flash and glare and roar of war, her unsparing sacrifice of blood and treasure to the cause of human liberty. Behold, too, now her virgin loveliness in the first full flush of blissful realization of joys which just victory brings. Sir, the story of history need not be repeated here; yet, Mr. President, who dare alter, who forget it? For my own part, I love to dwell upon its pages, to pour its precious treasures into the laps of my children, to hold its priceless lesson for their emulation. And even the Senate, sir, may well review, candidly review, those early events; and then if there remains amongst us the least of those deeper sentiments which actuated our sires, answer, if you can, how far, alas, how dangerously far, government has at last been given over to its original enemies. That somewhere and somehow there has been betrayal not even hardihood is audacious enough to deny. Deliberately, solemnly, in my place here, representative of a sovereign State, do I challenge denial that liberty to-day in America, as liberty was meant and understood in the bloody baptismal of revolution, so far from being an occasional welcome visitor, has been a total stranger to this Government for many years. Let no one start; if there be contrary sentiments, I am ready to maintain it. For, poor and weak though I be, truth is mighty.

I am prepared to hear some soft-handed, timid creature, anxious lest by something said here the people be disturbed from their bondage, charge me with "intemperate language." The country knows, however, that I dare hold up plain truth to this body. Doubt not that the truth is everywhere recognized, whatever, in certain quarters, interest or cupidity dispose some to deny. Fully conscious am I that plainness of speech subjects me, among the foolish, to animadversion; but to disguise truth or to withhold from it aught were, under the circumstances, worse than treason. Sir, special interests seek, I know, by intimidation to make plain speaking unpopular. Certain of the press even, allured by vainglory or gold, have set a fashion to deride and decry whatever is calculated to arouse the country to its true condition. Indeed, so strong has become insolence, feeding upon its own offal, that, let whomsoever desire action here which savors of public weal, and that Senator is at once denounced as a demagogue from one end of the Union to the other.

Here, Senators, I would be indulged, if but for a moment, in slight personal allusion; its illustrative character will be too apparent to require explanation or apology. It is known to most Senators that, by the indulgence of the Senate, I ventured a few observations, on the 11th day of December last, when this bill was referred. Whatever was then said, sir, was the natural overflow of a heart in deep sympathy with the poor, the laborer, with honest workers in every walk of life. For, saying nothing of disinterested justice to all such, upon the shoulders of these rests the security and glory of the Republic. That this is but simple truth only knaves are despicable enough either to disregard or to deny. From the sturdy mass of our people proceeds all—yes, all, I repeat—that is worthy the name of man amongst us; by their authority do Senators hold places of responsibility, and from the fruits of their industry are we sustained. By them, too, was not government itself ordained? Sir, if, then, that be true, how bestial the doctrine that mere wealth, for its own sake, may seize upon the potencies of government for its own aggrandizement.

Speaking broadly, government was instituted among men as a bar to evil in all forms. Covetousness and greed, especially—have these egregious enemies of sweat and toil, nevertheless, "rights?" Rights, sir, I say, vested rights, which government is bound to respect. Too well you know how utterly wreckful is such a pretense. Yet, Mr. President, taking these, my very words, watch plutocracy, you who care to busy your curiosity with the arts of low cunning and systematic villainy; for, even while I speak, spies and sentinels are impatient, and ere my last word shall be spoken a line of craven newspapers, seizing upon what has been so truthfully said, will contort it to deceive the public, as if anarchy were ranting treason in the Senate. Yet, let me repeat, government, American government, was not ordained to protect wealth for its own sake, aside from the fair fruits of honest toil. No vested rights may be imputed to wealth. I go further; government was not designed to foster wealth for its own sake; certainly not where, by conspiracy, it assumes monopolistic forms. Legislative favor, therefore, laws framed whereby acquisition may be accelerated beyond what is natural, favoring one against another, favoring one section above the rest of the country, thus impoverishing many and enriching the few, the veritable Pandora's box, sir, whence sprang all our evils, criminally outraging justice and flushing every statute of liberty with shame, burning, mortifying shame. Sir, this is a serious business, and I challenge any to a denial. I charge that in every essential part the Constitution has been trampled under foot and American institutions overthrown. What? Ah, the form may still remain, but of what value, pray, is form, if the substance be gone? But I bid plutocracy be not too exultant; it is not gone forever. Thank God it will return, soon return; triumphant Democracy, ere long, will restore to the temple our ark of the covenant from Republican hands. Plutocracy, be warned, I say, God's people shall have their own. And yet, sir, so accustomed have favored interests become, that now they audaciously plead illicit favors as if rights in themselves, marvelously appropriating estoppel, as they have wrongfully appropriated everything to themselves, since endurance and patience have been mistaken for laches on the part of the people.

So that, Mr. President, on the occasion named my few simple words on behalf of truth and justice scarcely left my lips when a pampered, silken-robed, scriveling set of conspirators, surprised and alarmed, curled haughtily, though nervously, at their choppy mustaches, and bit patrician finger nails in puzzled haste, so importunate was their eagerness to hurry a polluted press to mock and ridicule a homely friend of labor. Instantly paid trust journals up and down the country, with one accord, in the selfsame breath, and manifestly upon identical command, thinking to discredit my cause, centered upon me from a thousand sources vituperation, artfully put as news, and consummate wrath covertly dressed in the habiliments of humor. Upon that occasion I had ventured—an unskilled, plain man—to speak in honest terms upon a subject which I know to be near the hearts of that large army of men who wear overalls and hickory shirts. What offense, pray? Meet the issues. Shall no one speak for them in the Senate? True, I had essayed the unexpected and unconventional—had addressed the Senate—a new Senator—upon the eleventh day of my service. Why should there have been delay? Arkansas, sir, is she not the equal of any State upon this floor? For her I reply "Yes." Against whom, then, has one of her Senators offended? Precedent? "Precedent," indeed! Mr. President, I care not for precedents, unless they be good precedents; and a precedent which binds the hands or closes the mouth of a Senator when duty bids him speak is a bad precedent, suited only to temperaments which shrink from responsibility. Still my conduct was by the press scouted as a boldness, against which they affected to scowl and sneer. Moreover, what at that time came from my heart, unstudied and unkempt—and for aught I know or care was ungrammatical, as was with much deliberation charged—nevertheless proceeding from a brain busied wholly with truth—conditional limitations, sir, to which the plutocratic newspapers are, in the nature of the case, total strangers. Modestly arraigning the protective system by quoting from a well-known trust magnate "As the mother of trusts," this was heralded as a most grievous fault. But it seems wherein I chiefly offended is yet to be mentioned.

Upon the occasion named I had adverted briefly and truthfully, if somewhat fervently, to the nature of the punishment proposed by this bill. Believing punishment by fine only abortive, I urged and still urge, as part of this bill, penal servitude as wisest and best. Fine a trust? A policy of that sort can have no other effect than to excite contempt, if it does not irritate to renewed exorbitance, for what Senator is too blind to know, what everybody else realizes, that only to fine a trust is but to add to operating expenses; a veritable fine upon the innocent consumer at last. Ah, Mr. President, let the Senate meet bravely and patriotically the issue which is set before us. It is square and sharp. Shall autocracy or democracy dominate; shall the Republic endure, or shall there arise from its ruins a despotism of wealth? Sir, if constitutional Government, think you, be worth the saving, then, in God's name, lend your might and main to rescue it from gluttony and greed! Trusts must be destroyed or they will destroy all else. That trusts are criminal, aye, that they are ethically treasonable, is everywhere known, if not openly charged or admitted. I am aware, to the contrary, of the specious pretext offered that the trusts are benefactors; that they develop industries and reduce the cost of commodities. Fundamentally false, what is stronger proof of their egregious infamy? I have neither time nor inclination to dignify this falsehood by argument; but I remind the Senate that this Government was builded for something loftier than cheap tea, cheap steel, cheap tobacco, and cheap petroleum. Nor, sir, is American slavery to be compensated by any of these. Your stalking horse Troy is not to be again subjugated by disguises like that. Away with madness and folly. Trusts are wicked conspiracies and combinations of men; punish them, I say—not the shadow, but the substance. Let flesh and blood feel the inexorable mandate of law.

What say your criminal codes? Are conspiracies to kill, to rob, or burglarize foolishly denounced or punished? Are only conspiracies fined? No; you apprehend and punish men. Your specious rejoinder I readily anticipate and grant, that corporations are entities owning estates and may be punished by fines; let their officers act for them as other agents and should not be held personally for what is done officially, but, sir, I deny that an officer can rob "officially," that he can violate the law "officially," while the entity itself can only act by law; so that but for the evil purposes of men going beyond law the entity only would prove harmless. What then? Sir, I say the penitentiary. Open prison doors; set that alternative before conspiracy, graft, and greed. The penitentiary; that prospect alone can now restore the country. And, sir, the term of imprisonment must be formidable; let even men of wealth or station, if guilty, feel the draw of the inexorable halter of the law.

Such, upon the occasion named, were my sentiments deliberately expressed before the Senate and the country, though not in my present language. Nor do I offer now the slightest apology. No new theory or strange doctrine has been advanced. Hired scriveners will cry out, as of late they invariably cry out whenever honest men speak in behalf of truth and justice, "Anarchy!" "Socialist!" but it is only an old stratagem of guilt in new form—it is but the hue and cry of the thief, made as he runs. No; what I have maintained is as old as time.

Every criminal code is based upon it. From the beginning of English history that doctrine has been applied readily to the poor, the ordinary, the common thief. Upon what, then, is the Senate asked to delay? Why, pray, shall not men, such as Rockefeller, Harriman, Rogers, and that ilk, be treated by the Government upon the same level as other thieves? And yet, sir, when I ventured to suggest it, lo, there arose a shout of derision. Certain of the press, mostly Republican, but some pretendedly Democratic—for money will sometimes buy either—seized upon my words as if every letter exhaled the foul breath of treason.

Diminutive editors in paroxysms of frenzy grimaced and gesticulated as though there had been committed an unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost. Puniest of creatures, miserable, monocarpous, misnamed men, pressed trousers and all, slinking cravens at the golden feet of Mammon, frothed madly, upon seeing my words; their little, weak bodies trembled, the limbs twitched and jerked as in spasm; the eyeballs rolled nervously, and the eyes emitted a greenish light, while the poor, brainless creatures snarled and snapped aimlessly, as do ordinary dogs, as it is said, affected with hydrophobia. Such seem to have been the first effects upon a plutocratic press. But, do not misunderstand me. I arraign not one honest newspaper. I know and appreciate the value to liberty of an unmuzzled press. Under wise and patriotic guidance, no power or influence goes before unbridled journalism when justice and freedom are at stake. The press in the past, I know what part it accomplished, I know its valiance, its brave deeds in behalf of government by the people. Mighty power for good, it is also, in wicked hands, a power for evil; and designing men, seizing upon the press wherever possible, are transforming its power into agencies of evil. Ah, I earnestly pray that infinite wisdom ever guide our patriotic editors in this trying hour. Despite iniquitous tariffs even upon your white paper, roll your ample pages to the winds of heaven and let the farthest reaches of civilization gather truth as it flies. And, oh, may your white wings, wide extended, hover always closely about, a protection and a shield to labor everywhere, and to the husbandman whose industries feed the nation. Ah, sir, I make no war upon legitimate journalism; on the contrary, what they stand for I stand for, what we jointly seek no lover of justice can despise. Individualism universally regarded and developed is the only hope of man. You may talk of greatness, of development, and of power, but all these are vain unless individualism be their highest fruition.

Fearlessly do I proclaim that in proportion as government neglects individual well-being it attains not the ends for which government was ordained. True, government itself is a combination; but it is a union, not a trust, constituted to promote liberty, not of a mass or of an aggregation of men as a body, or of the majority, as is sometimes foolishly supposed, but to assure, through the strength of the whole, the individualism of every part, however weak. All ulterior combinations, therefore, amongst the parts which are subversive of these primary ends to that extent are at enmity with freedom. I am not unaware that the trusts make bold to deny that they are among combinations or conspiracies of the class here implied. Indeed, amongst a spawn of other presumptuous sophistries advanced it is now audaciously maintained that so far from being enemies they are benefactors to society. Pointing to present prices of some commodities over earlier prices and wholly ignoring favoring conditions which time and developments have wrought in spite of the trusts, they modestly exclaim, "Behold the fruits of our benevolence!" But, sir, the American people are not objects of charity. Not the pittance, but the principle, it was which drove the colonists to annul by sword the tax upon tea. Ah, "benefactors!" Upon like plausibility can ordinary larceny be heralded as benevolence, and the more widespread and systematic the thefts—God save the mark!—the wider and more general the benefits of so great munificence; for, truth to say, the subject-matter which provoked this sort of "disinterested thrift" is usually put upon the market "regardless of cost." But I shall not further dignify a false pretense. Benefactors, indeed! Behold the veritable mountains of gold piled up and still piling up in the strong vaults of a few men as a result of their undying charity for the people.

Equitably applied, all this unearned wealth, had it been left with the people, would have builded in each State a college at a cost, inclusive of endowment, of $10,000,000; a home for veterans of the civil war at a cost of twenty million; an agricultural academy at a cost of forty million; an orphan asylum, a poorhouse in every county, ample for all coming demands; museums and art institutes in every hamlet, bountifully endowed the school fund of each State, threaded the land with macadamized roads, bridged rivers and streams, reduced State and other taxes to a mimimum, and left the people with good homes, unacquainted with debt or grinding poverty, while peace, quietude, and contentment would everywhere abound. The sober, sane, simple truth! Let scavengers of plutocracy howl! Truth, God's living truth—where are its defenders? Miserable travesty upon noble manhood, post-graduates in all arts of slander or defamation, I challenge a subsidized press! The people know your design and spurn your pretenses, whether under show of argument or more servient hypocrisy. Go! damnable imps of pelf and greed, I defy your taunts! Tear to fragments my political career, if it comport with your execrable will; stifle and distort my every utterance; not satisfied, if such be your brutal frenzy, lash my poor form into insensibility; then, if it be your further pleasure, gnaw from my stiffening limbs every vestige of quivering flesh; howl in wretched bestiality through my own innocent blood as it drips from your fiendish visages; drag then, if you want what remains, into the filth and vermin of your foul den and burn it upon the altar of Baal, or scatter it before the friendly winds of heaven to your betters, the carrion crows of the field! All that may they do, all and more, if there yet be open further depths of infamy to a polluted besotten press. These ready servants of greed, what have they not done or attempted to fasten still more securely an autocracy upon us? It seems to be their special function, not simply to pervert truth, but to threaten and terrorize public men. Dare a Senator align himself with the people? What? Yes; many illustrious servants of the people have lifted honest voices here and elsewhere against the march of plutocracy, to fall ambushed, politically assassinated, and by whom? By the trusts, wearing masks. Ah, sir, newspaper masks. But, Mr. President, insignificant as am I, if my political career be marked, let them sharpen their blade, for I will be here at the appointed hour, and while here only God can stay my voice in behalf of organized, united labor and the yeomanry of America.

Mr. President, it was said of old, "Ye can not serve God and Mammon." Ah, Senators, I would dare assert this immortal truth even upon this floor, for in that simple doctrine is to be found the root principles of all just government. Analyze or differentiate, but it remains the sum total. Not from superstition; not necessarily from sectarian views. But resting in the essential polarity of a mortal mind, the affections of man can not embrace objects which are fundamentally repulsive. Nor, sir, is that doctrine applicable only to individuals. Governments dare not disregard it. Time can not alter or abate its force. You may content yourselves with procrastination or assure me that God no longer deals with nations. The Bible is plain; the orthodox belief is explicit. As to personality and personal relations, as affecting conceptions of God, I leave to each for himself; but for myself, one thing I know: Baal is not God; and I reason that while Baal deals with nations for evil, God must continue to combat him and rule for good. Skepticism may stalk, but be warned, Senators, the rule of Mammon is the rule of ruin, and sooner or later government must pay the penalty. Bring, sir, to your assistance the history of Europe. What has been the doom of empires who knew not God? Good, sir, if you will have my creed, for "good" and "God" are identical principles—the fruits and essence of the divine mind. And if we are to profit by history, turn your thoughts upon our distracted country, where Mammon has stormed the very walls and holds the strong places with brutal fury.

Mr. President, to enter upon an elaborate review of conditions which distract this unhappy country would be supererogation. So long and cheerless is the history of man's inhumanity to man. Trusts and their cause, predatory wealth in all its forms, little as may be supposed, is, sir, a matter of common knowledge. In vain is hidden their perfidy under such high-sounding terms as "science" and "finance;" in vain it is assumed that "business" is a thing peculiar to the elect and wholly apart from the so-called "common people;" terms, sir, ill chosen to designate the sturdy citizenship of America. In vain, too, has it been sought to throw about modern methods of "finance" an appearance of legality and respectability. Repeated and rapidly increasing crimes have found them out.

And I charge, sir, that such conditions could not have survived a day save by favor of this Government. The field is inviting, but time forbids that I now descend into particulars. But in what manner Federal policies for more than forty years have steadily wrought, involving a recital of wretched detail, even to an American schoolboy, it were folly to recount. From the close of the civil war to this hour Mammon has been as busy as busy can be. Who does not recall his sinister manipulation of our greenback currency? Erecting a national banking system despite the Constitution, these banks are temples all over the land adapted especially to his worship. Who inspired resumption to his glory? It was Mammon, sir, who bound and gagged the people in the galling bonds of protection, a system which for bold outlawry and despotic confiscation distances far the remorseless tribute of Cæsar. Who but the god of gold demonetized our silver? Monopoly has been intrenched; favorites have been advanced; his worship, even in the Christian churches and colleges, fostered; his code is graft, his followers are thieves, and his heaven is hell. Moreover, so powerful and insolent has grown this money god that no sooner do the people seek to overthrow his power or to retard his further subjugation of our fair country than straightway he, in wrath, brings down upon the suffering millions—men, women, and children—a panic, a pestilence of ruin. Oh, boasted Republic, brightest star in the constellation, blessed stay and security to and for the highest good of man; once glorified not less in prayer than in song the world over wherever hope dared whisper to sinking liberty, what shall be thy ultimate destiny under the madness and inhumanity of man? Sir, it is the old story—selfish ambition and love of power. When shall men come to that glorious understanding, basic in all righteousness, that only conformity to the good insures real felicity? Homiletic, am I told? Does the Senate find itself beyond or above recurrence to the simple truths which make for godliness? It has been said that the Senate is dignified. Very well; there be dignity. Dignity, true dignity, always gentle, unassuming, and simple, denotes probity and justice.

Dignity marks him who loves truth, whose life is a daily expression of inward harmony with the real and good, while false dignity is an attempt to disguise what is hideous and bald. Then, in simple terms, I make bold to speak, and I say to the Senate I know its acknowledgment of those simple, though more sublime truths which uphold the right in all things. And if there be the least confusion, disenthrall yourself from the artificial modes or beliefs, so that from the eternal fountain of homiletic truth you may drink copiously. To destroy evil, the minds and purposes of men must rightly apprehend its genesis. Evil, broadly, is conditional, not personal. It is a negation, a disregard of law, erroneous conceptions of what is good. Under ignorant beliefs men seeking the good yet set up and worship error, entailing, logically, a brood of our present evil consequences. It follows that many, as well individual as national, beliefs—idols, indeed, sir—must be altered and demolished. Erroneous principles, as they are called, must give way to righteousness ere again in America a sense of supreme brotherhood shall give character to our laws. In considering the great question now before this body, therefore, I pray Senators to drink deeply from pure fountains of homiletic truth.

Mr. President, our present commercial disorders, trusts, and concomitant evils are bitter fruits of noxious seed long ago sown. Deliberately do I affirm that, despicable as is the blood, trusts are a legitimate breed. Specifically stated, conceived in special privilege, nurtured by protective tariff, and fattened upon public swill of every kind, the overgrown wards of Republicanism, following the principles of their being, turn naturally to pillage as a duck to water or a sow to her wallow. Their denial, I doubt not, will be forthcoming. The country expects not a plea of guilty. In the State of Florida an old negro, arraigned upon a charge of larceny of an alligator from a farm where the young of these quadrupeds are reared, is said to have pleaded "not guilty" to "de allergashuns" and to have defied "de allergater." You insolently "stand pat," a paraphrase of the negro's plea; but to "stand pat," as a plea, is dilatory—is the equivalent of standing mute; but you shall be put to trial. Trusts, I repeat, are a legitimate breed. By no accepted tables can they be looked upon as bastards.

Trusts have conformed, if to none other, to the law of biogenesis, for their strain of blood, such as it is, has remained unmixed for generations. True in every trait and lineament, from father to son, their ancestral line, not heading in, but linking with the Tories of Revolutionary times, reaches its polluted source in George III; and well do they boast such princely ancestry, for, although possessed not of the prince's courage, they inherit both his meanness and his rapacity. Here, however, sir, I must pause, for, sir, not at this late day would I by word or deed do aught of injustice to even that cruel monarch. George III, to be sure, was narrow and cruel, but his tyranny was a direct force. As king did he stifle justice and look with disdain upon liberty. By brute force was his royal prerogative maintained. He therefore laid tribute without mercy, taxed without representation, filled his dominions with squalor, and trampled ruthlessly upon his subjects. Yet all this, Mr. President, was in strict accord with the genius of monarchy. As king, so went the theory, he could do no wrong. That despised Prince, let it be said here in strict justice to his memory, however, abhorred a thief; a thief, sir, in the ordinary development of cupidity. Unlike his descendants, George hated not his colonies, but far different sentiments stimulated his policies toward them. His conduct in America showed forth but the genius of empire. and colonial challenge of kingly prerogative, the assertion of the right of self-government—these were the things which started royal armies hitherward. But I mean not to dwell upon events of the Revolution. All that was hateful to American liberty, however, did not depart from our shores with the departure of British arms. British sentiment, distrust of the people, and love of power found lodgment still. Toryism, though despoiled of its personal king, demanded "a strong government," one rested upon wealth, privilege, and class. Nor during all these years has Toryism abandoned its claim to the throne. Born to rule, according to their creed, the classes view the masses only as slaves, by nature constituted by their work to enrich and glorify the king.

Such is the spirit of the class; and so, I say, the spirit of George III still animates persons and parties in this country. You have but to look about and around you. Tribute and favoritism, political debauchery in its most malignant forms, coalition, combination, and conspiracy rule the hour; whereby, sir, so mighty has become predatory wealth, so widespread and assertive have become the dominions of Mammon, that did their illustrious ancestor behold the vast extent of their power, typified in the Standard Oil Company and like aggregations of iniquity, George III must groan in disappointment, while the very devil himself, swelling the chorus of his imps in hell, chants in fiendish exultation. And yet, this is America; America, proud, boasted America, home of the free! Ah, yes, the selfsame; the same, Mr. President, which aforetime, pledged her all for independence; the same which, in the crisis of revolution, testing the devotion of her people, put monarchy everywhere, for the first time in the history of the world, in mortal terror. Oh, America, albeit to-day! May the God of Moses, in infinite mercy and pity, rescue liberty in America from a thraldom more abject than Egyptian bondage, to the infidelity of gold. His faithful poor in every State in the American Union may He deliver from that sweat and toil which brings no reward! Strike down the power of Pharaoh, O God of Israel!

Ah, Mr. President, looking now over our past, I would ask what, after all, is indeed independence? Harnessed by a hundred favoring laws, our commerce terminates in the lap of luxury, while the people, robbed of its fruits, are lashed without mercy to renewed toil. And in a country, too, blessed by Providence beyond other portions of the earth. Behold, in proof, the extent of this Republic; its boundless area of fruitful soil, its mountain ranges, its deep carrying rivers, its lakes and seas. The very bowels of the earth are overflowing, so generous has been the bounty of Almighty God. Charged, too, are now found to be the very heavens with inexhaustible riches; and everywhere the needs and measures of life are piled with godly prodigality and paternal amplitude. Sir, I indulge no poetic fancy; for language in its meagerness may not depict the natural glories of this Republic. Indeed, from the beginning America seems to have been foreordained a special habitat for liberty and independence. As if by specification and plan divinely prepared, here has been wrought a Utopia in blissful reality for us and for our children. For, I can not forego the proud declaration, and I make it in reverential thankfulness to God, that nowhere has the sun yet kissed a spot nor set upon a foot of earth where liberty is more indigenous or where by nature independence is courted with the same passionate abandon as in America. Such, too, was the grateful realization of the fathers when first they came into their so glorious inheritance. Reread our blood-stained history; read it in the yet glimmering lights of Concord and Lexington, when, for the sake of liberty on this continent, the very foundations of the deep were broken up and the heavens opened for independence. The doctrines at that time enshrined it were needless now to recount. Enough that to-day they are the sum total of Democratic faith; and heaven vouchsafe that those principles once again inspire administration, diffusing uniformly the blessings of free government amongst the people of every section, to the utter rout of Mammon from our affairs, public and private.

Mr. President, pardon me again for slight personal allusion. It will, I trust, tend to advance the thought which I have desired to impress upon this body. It will be readily recalled that a Republican President only recently sent to the Congress a most remarkable democratic special message. In that document, the Chief Executive, rising above his party, boldly, bravely, and truthfully dealt with conditions to which I have here alluded. Without regard to party that message thrilled the American people from Florida to California. It was a bugle call as from the skies; the people heard and took hope, for its truth went to the heart of the nation. Yet, sir, quite a contrary though simultaneous effect was produced in other quarters. Indeed, the livid streak through the Senate which marked the passage of that document had not faded from sight ere proof of good marksmanship told that the President had hit his aim; for instantly from plutocratic press and spokesman there arose, as from sewer mouths, a dense sickening odor which stifled the air and affronted the nostrils of all decency.

Thinking to abate the force of that message, members of the President's own party joined, more or less openly, in whatever criticisms might serve their purpose, for the Chief Executive, deliberately defying adverse influences, had added fuel to a Democratic conflagration which must sweep the land. Mark you, Senators, I say "sweep the land;" yes, sweep the land until corporate power be controlled, predatory methods all consumed and their ashes sifted upon the winds. Not as a Senator only but as a citizen of this Republic do I proclaim that of right this is a free country. "Equal rights to all" is at eternal enmity with "special privilege." Monopoly is an alien, therefore, and an enemy. Not the person, but the wicked policy of George III, in whatever form of disguise it were, that threatened the inalienable rights of man. Ah, sir, those policies must be driven from our councils. For if at last we have but to choose as between forms of tyranny, then the infidelity of gold is more to be despised. And yet, so bold has become this tyranny, seeing the arousing temper of the people and failing longer to beguile them, the trusts insolently, by traduction, seek to drive and intimidate our leaders. But America is not Russia; nor are Americans Russians. Lovers of peace, still Americans love liberty as nothing else; and, sir, they have both the courage and ability to defend it. Ah! my words in certain quarters may be laughed to scorn, while plutocracy revels in feigned security amidst dance and song. Sir, their songs are not music; their revelry proceeds not from joy, for music is the language of love and joy; true joy is the flower of righteousness which blooms in a heart softened by love. I know, Mr. President, that in what we are weak the trusts are strong. There is a magic potency in wealth, gold, stocks, and bonds. Yet a weakness there is to be found, and against that weakness the people are peculiarly strong; for the trusts, bold, brazen, and haughty, they are still as Goliath meeting David. The God of Israel is with the people of this Republic; He shall be their strength, so that the powers of hell shall not prevail against them.

Nor do I care for your denial that this is a Christian country. Be not, however, deceived. God is the same to-day and forever. Be warned—ye can not serve two masters. If Baal be God, serve him, but, sir, we challenge you to a test of fire from heaven. The trust of the people is in the living God. In our hearts, if this motto has been stricken from our coin, His love there is ineffacable. By His power shall be lifted the cause of right and justice.

Sir, I would not by any allusion leave myself open to misconstruction. By an Executive order "In God we trust" was stricken from our coin. I have just alluded to that. Yet I wish to make definite a statement of my opinion that, under the circumstances, whatever the purpose, the order was consistent with the practices of the Republican party. "In God we trust" upon money which, controlled by national banks, is daily prostituted to do the work of the devil was blasphemous in the eyes of mankind. Upon a money system so utterly Christless what a bald hypocrisy! Yes, strike it off, out of decent respect for Almighty God, and leave to the people its restoration when government itself shall be rescued from debauchery and greed. Yes, doff the very livery of heaven; for by the authority of God's word I charge that you serve the devil. Strong language? If I be admonished of the teachings of Christ that "if one take your cloak give him your coat also," I reply that the selfsame Christ scourged the thieves from the temple.

But, Mr. President, at this juncture my mind has been somewhat diverted from its original course. Observation concerning Christ and God, naturally suggest to the mind the early history and some of the early professions of the Republican party. And turning to history, I would ask, Where is that great party of boasted emancipation, that vaunted God and morality band of crusaders who, more than forty years ago, assumed administration of this Government? Did some echo answer, "Wedded, hopelessly wedded, to the idolatry of gold?" Yes, and that, too, from the very beginning of its career. Prating long and loud of freedom, working that hypocrisy in season and out, that party, direct descendant of George III, under cover of solicitude for humanity has steadily intrenched against the ultimate indignation and vengeance of the people. Departing from its early professions, that party has erected in every portion of this fair land altars to the money god, and in them installed the priesthood of Mammon.

Through protective tariffs merciless tribute is forced upon the masses; commerce, bound hand and foot, is brought a helpless though struggling victim; labor, blessed hope of mankind under free institutions, brutally driven as galley slaves, as national banks bind as with cords of steel our every energy while plutocracy in fiendish glee and ravenous gluttony gorges its putrid stomach. Stop, Senators; in God's name I beseech you, think. Still, sir, I ask, what do you? To-day you fiddle while Rome is burning. You sit here marking time lest you do something. To-day, pending a frightful, a criminal panic, made out of the whole cloth, conspired with aforethought and brutal malignancy as a pretext to accomplish what the Aldrich bill is now attempting for the national banks under cover of relief to the country, you drone away the time here and hide your conduct and purposes pending an election. What the whole world knows you might know if you wished to know, that tinkering with the currency is the very worst thing that could be done, unless with one fell swoop the Congress wipe from existence every vestige of the national banking system. Building upon a rotten foundation, adding to the superstructure, may postpone but it will not avert what must inevitably come. A stable currency, if you really wish it, bottom your entire circulation upon Government notes at par with all coin in paying the debts, public and private, and expenses of the Government. But no, contrarywise, you hug the national bank in fond embrace, so effective has this system demonstrated itself to bind the people in hopeless slavery. Ah, "slavery!" The very term awakens some of my earliest recollections. Mr. President, it is said to be not in good form to speak carelessly upon the subject of ropes in a family where some member of which has been hanged. But the word "slavery"—this term, in view of the present condition of the people, reminds me of the early oratory of the Republican party, when Toryism was struggling for power. I recall the language of Charles Sumner, speaking at great Faneuil Hall, so early as 1855. Referring to the subject of tenure slavery, a system superinduced by Northern sales of negroes into the South, Mr. Sumner then said:

> Not that I love the Union less, but freedom more, do I now, in pleading this great cause, insist that freedom, at all hazards, shall be preserved. God forbid that for the sake of the Union we shall sacrifice the very thing for which the Union was made.

Yes; "God forbid;" such was the invocation. "God forbid that for the sake of the Union" we should sacrifice freedom. Freedom was more to be prized than Union, was it not, sir? And what was freedom at that time, that it should be of so great value? Sir, I tender no sectional issue. Nor do I wish now to detract one iota from what was then said of the freedom as applied solely to tenure slavery. What was said so long ago by Charles Sumner is brought forward only to prove the value of freedom, that it is worth more than Union. The party of Charles Sumner, then, was ready, if confronted with such a last alternative to secure liberty for the tenure slaves of the South, to overthrow our Government. I shall not here enter upon any analysis of the motives which actuated men during that period. Much fervid oratory was indulged, humanity was stirred, tenure slavery was doomed. I here make no issue; no one now defends that system; in that form negro slavery is gone forever. Indeed, I make bold to say that to the individuals who suffered it that system was wrong; not at that period wrong legally, for, wrong as it was ethically and morally, the law permitted sales by the North to the South and recognized property in slaves. But what I emphasize is that even under those circumstances negro freedom, so Republicans proclaimed, was more to be desired than Union itself. Freedom from tenure servitude let it be; no one elsewhere, certainly none in the South, would wish it otherwise. Nor can my mere mention of it in this connection afford opportunity, by seizing upon a dead issue, to divert the public mind from the living present. But your professions of devotion to liberty; how do your professions comport with what you have actually done? Your great love of freedom; where may we now look—what has been its depths, its lengths, and breadths? Ah, following appeals to sentiments of humanity which secured to you a long lease of power, what evidence of your love, what, indeed, have you not done to fasten upon whites and blacks alike a servitude in comparison with whose hopelessness tenure slavery were a boon? "God forbid that for the sake of the Union we should sacrifice the very thing for which the Union was made." "God forbid;" and yet both have been sacrificed, for upon the ruins of our erstwhile Republic flourishes to-day a feudal dynasty whose base servitudes rival Normandy or England in the palmiest periods of feudal tenures. Your doctrines have not been extended, your great love seems to have stopped with the negro, and even him you have finally betrayed.

Sir, confronted as is the country with dire calamity, I should in all just reason afford not to even the narrower souls the slightest pretext for stirring up passion or sectional discord, whereby to draw away the public mind. A ruse of that sort, however, can but produce general disgust. Tranquillity between North and South concerning sectional issues has closed, I feel sure, forever. Be destiny what it may, the future is our own. What is best for one shall be best for all, for by our united hands, working to a common purpose, beneath a common flag which floats proudly and resolutely over the dead past, seen and respected emblem of an unconquerable people, it is within our determination at every hazard to strive without ceasing until there shall be an equal and exact diffusion of justice, wholly disregardful of class, creed, or station. And therefore I can have no ambition to stir up memories of the past, for their own sake. Yet, Mr. President, I am not sensible of any just demand that on this occasion I lend myself wholly to mere oversensitiveness. Duty forbids that I shut my eyes out of a false delicacy. History, sir, shall we be truant to that? Upon the contrary, I, for one, shall dare there look at all times for what may be made of service to my country. And looking to history, what, I ask, under the influence of benign Republican love, has been the sad plight of the people, blacks no less than whites, now for more than one whole generation? Ah, what a long funeral train, what a dreary catalogue of evils. Behold the Republic prior to the sixties and behold it now; in the special light of that love for freedom which was so lustily proclaimed. With the ending of the civil war, "freedom" vindicated, victorious humanitarianism fully empowered, there began the work of love whose endearing tokens we now behold.

Review, sir, the panoplied retinue, moving in somber statelliness before your enrapt and ravished imagination. Heading the column are national banks, crowned and with ermine flowing, bearing each for itself the flag of our Union, emblazed in glittering letters upon its undulating folds "In God we trust;" next are a long line by fours, tariff barons, caparisoned and sable plumed; trusts, by tens abreast, fill the center, constituting more than a third of all; following these, currency manipulators, bearing gold standards; then, in the order named, a motley swarm, headed by 2,500 multimillionaires, 25,000 millionaires, and, still coming, railway mergers, bank frauds, insurance frauds, corruption funds, market gamblers, bucket shops, graft, commercial three-card monte men, blighting panic, lockouts, government by injunction, political filibusterers, legislative abasement to plutocracy, gag rules, billion-dollar appropriations, waste, fraud, public debauchery, oppression of the poor, and a thousand other evils make up the endless train. Oh, what wondrous love! Humanity, sir, the wide world over, hearing your early cries in behalf of freedom, has given heart and hand to the Republican party, thus plighting faith to its fidelity and devotion. And now, sir, that great fidelity—what has been its course? Ah, in vain do you seek to cover the fact or to divert attention from the worst. The whole world knows of your morganatic loves; denial can not longer defer the hour of domestic wrath. Oh, erstwhile devotee of gentle, winsome liberty, for shame that the love of gold has enslaved; that power's lecherous lust has enthralled your manhood. Return, oh return, truant spouse to a proper sense of domestic fidelity and felicity, for, related morganatically, though you may boast, to English royalty through George III, know, vain and foolish one, that your bastard ancestor is none other than whom, once upon a time, George Washington flung, flagrante delicto, from the throat of his beloved country. Be assured, too, that history will repeat itself in its own good time. You can not avert it. Conciliatory, and slow to resistance, the American people now mean to drive you from power.

Paul Revere, riding again, is shouting from house to house in swift warnings, for your recent panic, withering industry like a hot blast, only too plainly now manifests your ultimate purpose. Whatever hope of peace existed, this last means war—war to the extermination of autocracy, war upon predatory wealth in all its forms. But, Mr. President, there is something more to which I wish to invite attention as manifesting the present alarming temper and power of the trusts. Sir, I charge that they have adopted a system to corrupt the very fountains of individualism and of public morality. Our very children, the hope of the future, these they have insidiously set craftily to ensnare. Entering our churches and schools, masked and covered by pretended bounty and munificence, cold, calculating autocracy would metamorphose childhood, dry up the very springs of love, and steal away that soft and guileless innocence which characterizes the heart in the first flush of virginity, manly vigor, and power. Not content with robbing the present, they calculate upon enslaving the future. Not only would they steal from the tabernacle the ark of our covenant, but transform our colleges into temples to Baal. Broadcast would they sow seed of disloyalty, not alone to the brotherhood of man, but to the Fatherhood of God. Deny it? Ah, yes; denial is the expected, the universal resort of guilt. But, if you dare, I challenge you to put yourself upon the country. Ah, upon the contrary, what do they? Throw themselves, sir, upon the ample bosom of a grasping press, while generously enlarging endowments to churches and colleges—throwing up defenses, making ramparts against the power of the people.

Only recently, think, sir, there was published a denunciation and slander of your Chief Executive by a stall-fattened college professor, all because in a brave, democratic, special message, bluntly Western in directness, the President dared to call a spade a spade. And this most mighty prodigy of conservatism and wisdom—who is he? Whoever he may be, it was quite fitting that at the very crest of the present panic the music of his oration should have delighted the ear, as doubtless it did, of the New York Bankers' Association. Ah, "Day," I am told; Day is the name! James R. Day, the very same, sir! James R., chancellor of Syracuse University, paradoxical as it may seem. "Day," indeed! Period of effulgence, the antipode of darkness and night! Nowhere do our common calendars show it; nor have astronomical researches taken note of such a Day. In Genesis, it is true, the first seven days only are mentioned. Presumably, then, James R. is not of these. Logically, therefore, I take it he must have been prior in time; in fact the sum total of that darkness and void immediately antedating that negative or nebulous status spoken of in Genesis as "In the beginning," thus identifying James R. with the primitive, plutonic Day! His frantic frothings I should not stoop for a moment to dignify before the world did not they, made when and where they were, fittingly show forth the strutting boastfulness and daring arrogance of the money power. It is not enough that he has slunk out of sight into the stiff, thick night of his original obscurity. His sentiments were representative, nor shall the trusts go unwhipped for his bestial vomit against democratic truth.

Among other things, speaking of the recent special message, James R., taking a golden spoon temporarily from his month, said: "I charge the whole business with bearing the earmarks" ("the whole business" being the whole message, sir) "of disloyal slander and defamation of the commerce of the country." "Earmarks of disloyal slander"—those are his words—"disloyal slander to the commerce of the country;" as if there was a loyalty owing anywhere other than to the Constitution of the Union. "They are not," says Mr. Day (referring to the President's "attacks") "judicial, specific, and particular. They are sweeping, reckless, indiscriminate, and, upon their face, for the most part, false." Thus pleads the incomparable criminal lawyer, the paradoxical, sunless Day. With the green-bag load, bent upon technicality and delay, he ludicrously strides up and down, wrinkling his brow with wisdom, and the while busying himself with a show of assurance characteristic of the professional shyster who counts as success whatever wins. After roundly denouncing the President, this little Syracuse monstrosity counsels to New York banks, as if also master of the people, "to stop the ravings of the demagogue, serve vigorous notice upon the men" (the President he means, and others who hold to Democratic doctrine of the kind mentioned) "serve vigorous notice upon the men who are defaming our business men and discrediting our trade by representing our products as the sum of all villainies in fraud and adulteration." "If you will call to account," said he—"call to account" was his language—"call to account the men who are depreciating our bonds and stocks by comparing our great centers" (the bucket shops, he means, sir) "of brokerage and exchange with a den of thieves," and so forth, "sixty days"—so he speaks for those who precipitated the panic—"will put an end to our hard times." Only sixty days; so criminal, then, is their control and manipulation of the panic! Confession, indeed! What egregious effrontery! But, further, Mr. Day counsels his masters "to see to it"—the language of command and authority—to "see to it that our great railways have fair play in their efforts to make new adjustments" (new adjustments is what he calls it) "to meet the demands of a fabulously growing country."

God save the mark! We now are made aware for the first time to what must be referred the interminable, vexatious mergers, and rebating delays and overcharges with which the country has been so long inflicted. Mr. Day, following this grave counsel, turns to the people and in stilted pedantics warns them that they "must rise up out of suspicion, ignorance, and distrust concerning economic conditions and refuse to give their votes to men who defame their country," terms, sir, manifestly synonymous, in the vocabulary of Syracuse University, with "men who defame our tariff barons and trust magnates of New England." "If you acquiesce," continues Mr. Day, now again speaking to the bankers of New York, "if you acquiesce and by silence consent to the infamous work of the slandermonger and permit"—permit is the exact word—"permit the widening of the breach between our thrifty classes (stock gamblers and captains of graft, I take it, was immodest, sir) "and the restless, anarchistic socialists" (the toiling masses is a proper translation); "if you look on without uttering a word against an agitation which invites the anarchist to sharpen his dagger, that invites the poor"—mark his words—"that invites the poor to take property from the rich by violence because it has been stolen from them * * * then before another half decade blood will flow in our streets and the Night Riders' torch will light the heavens with appalling glare." Thus, in plutonic gloom, perched upon Syracuse University, quothed its sable-robed, though lilliputian, prophet. With what boldness, what assumption does plutocracy at last outline its campaign against public servants who dare challenge its unbridled sway. Ah, sir, there has been denial that Mr. Day speaks for the trusts. For whom, then, does he speak? Not certainly for the people at large whom he has characterized as "anarchistic socialists." "The whole people" are groveling "in suspicion, ignorance, and distrust concerning economic conditions," does he not charge? His, sir, is emphatically a special plea for "our thrifty classes," and he speaks for them.

The wrongs of the railways are called "efforts at new adjustments," and he speaks for them. His whole plea is a sugar-coated, technical evasion in defense of commercial brigandage and is meant to arouse wealth to greater relentlessness and violence. In one breath it is maintained that "the attack is not judicial, specific, definite;" in another he charges that the message "upon its face, for the most part, is false." Too definite to be understood, yet most of it, prima facie, false! False, most of it, upon its face, against nobody in particular. "A slander," says the voice from Syracuse, "upon our great centers of exchange, upon our thrifty classes!" The charges, it is complained, have not been definite, not specific; the allegations are not ample to constitute the offense. Very well; there is a new indictment: "We, the people of America, of whatever party, adherents to the doctrine of equal rights to all, in the name and by authority of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, do accuse the Standard Oil Company and John D. Rockefeller, its high priest, of the crime of treason, plutocratic robbery, and conspiracy to subvert government, committed as follows, to wit:

The said Standard Oil Company, and John D. Rockefeller, within and without the United States of America, for the last twenty-five or more years then and there, not having the fear of Almighty God before their eyes, but being seduced, persuaded, allured, and instigated by the blandishments and enticements of the devil and his imps of hell, inclusive of "stand-patters" against tariff revision, unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, maliciously, deliberately, wantonly, wickedly, mendaciously, and without decency or feelings of humanity; by means of national banks, tariffs, currency manipulations, gold standard, by stock exchanges, by produce exchanges, by bucket shops, and other gambling devices; by merger, conspiracy, pools, trusts, combinations; by subsidizing legislation and press and public institutions, including churches and colleges whenever and wherever practicable; by watering stocks, by fraud, deceit, common lying, rebating, overcharge, adulteration, fraudulent insurance, and thefts of insurance funds; by boodle election funds, graft, thefts, three-card-monte tricks, by a wicked colonial policy, by a public profligacy, by special legislation, and by other wicked and devilish means and devices, conceived by the devil aforesaid, and, in his absence, by Pierpont Morgan and John D. Rockefeller and their abettors, whereby the defendants, and each of them, have despoiled all the people, brought liberty to shame, and in the manner and by the means aforesaid the said corporations, trusts, and other defendant conspirators, instigated by the devil aforesaid and by his imps of hell, including the said "stand-patters," have wickedly, jointly, and severally set up, and attempted to set up, over the free people of America an oligarch of gold, against the inalienable rights of men, the justice and peace of God, and the exalted dignity of organized labor.

Such is the charge which the country makes against predatory wealth.

Sir, I now take leave of a little chancellor of a big university. Let his original obscurity fold again silently and congenially about him. In the amplitude of time sufficient intelligence may there penetrate to quicken sensibility, if not to repentance, nevertheless to the truth that obscurity is the proper habitat of small minds. The alarming sentiment, sir, of which Mr. Day was made the voice is alone what concerns the country. Upon every hand coming conflict presses nearer and nearer. Insatiate greed and vaunting ambition out of desperated pride will rule, if possible, or ruin. I repeat, as applicable, the words of the immortal Lincoln: "The Republic can not long endure half slave and half free!" If not exact, it is the substance; and what was then said of negro slavery applies broadly to-day to whites and blacks, slaves of graft and greed. And, Mr. President, seeing now the resolution of plutocracy, let the Democracy, let patriotic men in every State, indifferent to party lash and party line, make common cause in the November elections. Not as a partisan, but as a Senator and a citizen I pray God that the people, perceiving, will act resolutely in time to avert the danger. Party lines in such a crisis; let them, sir, go to the winds. I care not whom, joining hands with me in a common cause against the enemies of my country, be his tenets what they may, I hold him my brother. But woe to defenders of plutocracy, crawling, creeping, cringing travesties in the degenerate line of Adam, so wholly lost are all such to humanity! Before the forum of the people let plutocracy answer. In the nature of debate here, if argument were necessary, such a remedy is inadequate. To debate is futile, for those who will not hear are deaf to your entreaties, while the willing millions have been long convinced. Action, decisive action, must be our motto. But, sir, at this time I can not wholly forbear, indeed, the intolerant insolence of gold, so deep seated is its arrogance, a royal swagger so characterizes its bearing, its tone and manner is so insistently threatening and virulent that I can not at this hour wholly ignore it without a sense that duty to my country remains undischarged.

It is false, the deceptive cry, that Americans, any considerable portion, or that any part in America is at enmity with honest wealth. Nor has violence against plutocracy anywhere been counseled. The despotism of gold, while there is determined resolution to overthrow it, it is to be done in order and with decency by the American ballot. Violence? Sir, whatever of this has been counseled is found in publications and speeches inspired by plutocracy itself. But, sir, what would they understand or mean as "violence?" Godly wrath? Scourging thieves? Say you that such is violence? Ah! Mr. President, what means open, defiant denunciation of the masses "as suspicious, ignorant, and distrustful?" A merciless panic, criminally precipitated, followed by brazen boasting that it will be lifted only at the price of submission to Mammon? Here, then, is your violence! And if blood at any time shall flow in our streets or the heavens be lighted up by the Night Riders, be assured, Senators, that that glare, however appalling, heating the crimson flood at the feet of plutocracy, will metamorphose into a lake of everlasting fire.

Mr. President, be it far from me to excite needless alarm, but be not deceived by the conservatism of the people. For forty years or more patience has marked their every action; but patience, worn and discredited, has given place to resolution. Radical reforms must now be inaugurated, a swift return to fundamental justice. Dallying and procrastination, fruiting in mock performances here, must give place to earnest obedience to public demands. Sir, shall it be deemed chimerical, such a sentiment expressed in this great body—for here and now I do proclaim that this country, if it shall enjoy true prosperity, if it shall again take its place as leading among the Christian nations of the earth, must return to the old ways, the old sentiments, the old beliefs. Not to superstition, not to old errors. No, but to old simplicity, which regards justice; to old honesty and love whose correlation is the brotherhood of man. Turning backward? No! Turning forward and upward—manward and Godward!

Ah! do I dare declare before the Senate, before the wide world, that, putting down the lust for gold, American ideals must now be conformed to those simpler, aye, grander truths of immortal being. The false and dishonest which honeycomb commercial life, misnomered "thrift," a synonym for "graft," these, all these, and their kindred pestilentially swarming everywhere must perish under the tread of right and justice. Severe as have been its tests, the temper of the American people can endure no more. Rotten business and commercial structurals, if I mistake not the American temper, are doomed. The wonder is that, considering that temper, there has been tolerated for a moment amongst them a system which must ultimately work destruction to all for which government was instituted. Proudly have we boasted of the vastness and greatness of our Republic. Press and public men alike magnify the splendor of great cities in almost every State. The public domain is ample to house and feed the habitable globe. Unparalleled systems of railway, threading into rich mining, manufacturing, and agricultural sections, are laden with incomparable carrying, while phenomenal works, both public and private, everywhere meet the eye; all, all to what end? Glory, sir; only glory! That glory which has regard only for the jealousies and ambitions of surrounding nations. Prowess and statecraft "glory," which means "might" in war; greatness in comparison with other parts of the world. But, Mr. President, true glory in none of these is to be found. Besides, the people of America are a Christian people; and is not ours a republic? Essentially grounded upon justice, its cardinal principle the brotherhood of man, all glory is vain, every mark of greatness must grow dim and fade away, if it be not rested firmly upon individualism, which, sir, is the chief glory of man. Ah, the glory of the Republic!

Mr. President, be the Senate not in doubt, my sentiments are my own; and so, in my place here, denying that what glitters, or that mere brute power is glory, I charge that until equality is assured and labor and merit accorded justice, so that individuals, men, be unshackled in life's fitful race, shame rather than glory must be the portion of this Republic. Babylon, Egypt, Rome, begloomed in paganism, splendid in national achievements, unsurpassed in arts, letters, and architecture, whose wealth dazzled mankind and whose arms terrified, what nevertheless, have we at last more than they? The towers of Babylon have crumbled; ruins, it is true, of the coliseum, yet the name, but the glory of Rome is only ruins. Ah, I need not be assured that there, sir, "still stand the Pyramids." Yes; but bald and dead. Amidst the stifling solitude, massively, brutally, the Pyramids have withstood decay, vain monuments of stone, blindly peering into oblivion, as if fated to mock that national glory whose foundations are reared not in the hearts or affections of man. Sir, I honestly pray you, let us promise for this Republic a different glory. I would put it down to ravages of time, make it impregnable to the elements of decay. I hold with the belief of perpetuity in government. Dissolution and death are penal, necessarily—the awful price with which governments no less than men purchase so-called "pleasure and glory" for a season. Contrarywise, whatever is good in the essential constitution of being survives forever. Condition the Republic, then, sir, if you would avert its destruction; conform its resultants to an immortal environment from whence alone proceeds whatever is of lasting moment. Restore this Republic, therefore, I pray the Senate, to her primitive purpose; moor her back to an anchorage where justice is deep, where contentment and peace, as green sward, line the shore and far and wide overspreading the skies, where eternal morning, from horizon to horizon seem vibrant in the rising glory of fraternity and union. Deem me not too importune; for what think you portends the unrest, the strikes, the distress, the suffering, and poverty in a land so naturally blessed?

Sir, do men seek out these things of free choice and hug them in a fond embrace as so many blessings to themselves and to their children? Or are these conditions but incident to and irremedial even in boasted American government? No! Let us for once try justice. To dispel unrest, murmuring discontent, suffering, and poverty, try happiness upon the American plan. Let the Government send amongst them an army of equal blessings and equal opportunity. Unfrock captains of industry and colonels of tariff regiments. Relieve from duty Major Privilege and Brigadier Favor. Court-martial General Graft; put in the guardhouse his Lordship Monopoly, and shoot, as a camp-following traitor, wherever and whenever found, venal vagabond journalism. With such an army thus unhampered, armed with justice, you may mow down discontent, put poverty to flight, and bind the people in the everlasting bonds of peace and happiness. With my whole heart I challenge you to assure to the people a fair and equal race for those prizes which the God of nature has set before us. A consummation so much to be desired will demand all of our energies and all of our courage. Deep-seated the influences which must be dislodged and routed. False standards, long unchallenged, are now to be supplanted by probity and fairness, while trusts and associated evils shall be summarily executed; beheaded, sir, without benefit of clergy. Monopoly, every vestige of it, if this Government shall be restored to the affection of the people, must be strangled without cessation while one spasm of ebbing life remains. Moreover, Mr. President, even corporate activity, useful as, with legal restraints, corporations may be, demands rigidity of legal control. Soulless and artificial, corporations only of all persons are by nature and constitution slaves, bereft of every right and privilege save those of slaves. Yet, under favoring laws, corporations, how have these baseborn creatures presumed to the place of master. Or can it be that, having builded other than was dreamed, there now, at the full tide of our material hopes, spring from the loins of the Republic monsters to seize upon and devour before our eyes the last hope of liberty?

Sir, to this what some would make reply I am fully aware. Great public and private enterprise, it is observed with singular irrelevance, call for united minds and means beyond the dream of individual effort. Sophistry such as that—the best, to be sure, where all is bad—is offered but to deceive. Never for a moment, as the enemy well knows, has the most radical of my school of believing inveighed against great corporate enterprise, public or private. Development, progress, advancement, broad and deep and high, strike boldly for these and, in God's name, whatever betides, I shall follow you, scouting mere partisanry as but a shadow whose objective alone appeals to the highest hopes of the race. For one, I stand for government which for a verity assures to all men life, liberty, and happiness—not to some, not to a few, but to all. Not for the greatest good to some, or even to all. No; but let wise laws be so ordered that the weak and lowly, the minority, and the individual citizen shall be amply assured. Utopian dream? Nay, nay! Majorities whipped by passion or swayed by selfishness, hurried blindly out of love of power, or maddened, as leaders often are, under the spell of wealth, crucify minorities; individualism is trampled upon mercilessly and men by the thousands—men, women, and children—are fed to the crunching wheels of Mammon, while other thousands are offered up in sacrificial piles to the god of gold.

Mr. President, this Government, be assured, was designed to be, and so it shall remain, a government of, for, and by the people. Regardless of party, then, I pray that it may be restored to them. Short of that all exertion, all progress, though there be transitory gratulation, will at last disintegrate and fall away. I, sir, would that we rear a great government, builded not for the present alone, but for our children. Ideal government, so far from being incompatible, is in accord with more comprehensive enterprise, with broader and deeper currents of civic and industrial life. Indeed, ideally a republic aspirant in all material progress may righteously challenge the envy of nations and court world-wide the admiration of civilized man. Good government is not incompatible with the acquisition of wealth nor with the wise and beneficial disposition of it, but, sir, this is yet to be reaffirmed: That government possesses not elements of perpetuity where administration disregards justice and where public laws defy the equality of man.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will indulge me a few minutes longer. I am just about through.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire very much, and I shall conclude in a very few moments.

Mr. President, I can not bring myself to a conclusion of these remarks without some word of entreaty, something addressed to a sense of humanity no less than to a sense of official responsibility. Before high heaven I implore the Senate by the equanimity, justice, and wide influence of your policies to win back the hearts of our people. I entreat not for the present alone, but for the future. I know, and you know, that without contentment there must be injustice, and if there be room for injustice, government, if liberty be not sacrificed, must be reformed. Sir, I am awfully sensible that we are but men; nor is there, therefore, unwarrant if it be inferred that we are possessed of the hopes, the weaknesses, and the ambitions of men. Seize then, Senators, upon a propitious moment. Restore the Republic to her primitive moorings. For fleeting show only at last are wealth, ambition, and power. While their enticements are seductive to selfishness and love of glory, be reminded in the full flush of life that in death they are separated from us. Besides, looking to posterity, the heritage which must be left them, can it be that at so enormous a cost we are willing to sacrifice our very children upon the altar of Moloch? Mr. President, in all ages monuments have been reared to perpetuate men and deeds. In our own day, libraries, beautifully emblazoned, and rich endowments to colleges, mark the yearning of men to be remembered. These monuments of stone, however, must decay. Not one stone will be left upon another. Disintegration ultimately shall sweep, as fine sand before the winds, every particle of the monumental piles. Mr. President, chide me not when I plead for this Republic. To her, sir, have I given of my best love, and devoutly do I pray that it may be perpetuated to our children. I invoke all the power of this great body, therefore, to build here a monument. Looking abroad, nowhere is there beheld a single ray of hope for liberty if at last American institutions shall prove too weak to endure the strain which is now upon them. Let us build a living monument, mortar its foundations deeply, securely in the hearts of the people. Rising, sir, supremely above selfish considerations and awaking from every sinister or partisan dream, let the great Senate of the United States scourge from power predatory wealth and assure forever to us and to posterity the priceless blessings of equal rights and universal liberty. To such a consummation, while yet it is day, may God in his wisdom concentrate every energy of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

PUERTO RICO SUGAR COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with section 32 of an act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Puerto Rico, and for other purposes," approved April 12, 1900, I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the executive council of Porto Rico to the Puerto Rico Sugar Company, the Compañía Azucarera Central Machete, and to Messrs. Mullenhoff and Korber.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 1, 1908.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—DEPTH OF WATER IN COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes in order that I may make a statement of facts which, it seems to me, should be made in justice to the commercial interests of my State as well as in justice to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

A few weeks ago the Senator from California, in delivering an address in this Chamber on the American Navy, put forth the argument that the size of a nation's battle ships and other vessels of war must of necessity be restricted by the depth of water in the ports of the country, and in the course of that discussion he offered a table showing the depth of water at the entrances to the principal ports of the Pacific coast, which table had been furnished him by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, I believe.

Mr. PERKINS. And also by the Government engineers.

Mr. FULTON. Also by the Government engineers, the Senator says. I was not aware of that. However, the RECORD shows that it was furnished, I believe, by the Coast and Geodetic Survey. In that table the depth of water is stated to be at San Diego, 27½ feet; at San Francisco, 33 feet; and at Portland, Oreg., about 19 or 20 feet.

I was not present at the time the Senator delivered that portion of his speech, or the error would have attracted my attention and I would have had it then corrected, so that no misapprehension would have resulted and no ill feeling would have followed. I did not, however, hear the statement, and my attention was not called to it until a couple of days ago, when I saw an article in one of the principal papers of Portland, Oreg., very severely censuring the Senator from California because of the statement. Since then I have looked into the matter to ascertain the facts, and I think it is important that the statement should be corrected and that the circumstances under which it was made should be given, in justice to the Senator from California, because it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if any considerable number of the people of my State should reach the conclusion that the Senator from California is hostile to our interests in any respect. I take great pleasure in testifying that no one has done more earnest work to secure appropriations for the improvement and development of our rivers and harbors on the Pacific coast, and those of Oregon especially, than has the senior Senator from California. I am very sure that he would just as soon be guilty of misrepresenting facts to the disparagement of the harbors on the coast of California as he would of those on the coast of Oregon. Of course the statement is entirely inaccurate, namely, that there are but 19 or 20 feet of water in the port of Portland, Oreg.

In a letter written to the Senator from California by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, of March 20, he states that—

The portion of the article—

Referring to a newspaper article which the Senator from California had inclosed to him commenting on this statement—

The portion of the article referring to Portland evidently refers to the depth on the Columbia River bar and not to the depth which can be carried to Portland.

Now, it is utterly amazing that an official occupying the position of Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey should make such a statement as that. There never has been a survey which has shown that there are but 19 or 20 feet of water on the Columbia River bar. On the contrary, the statement which he gave the Senator was issued in February last, whereas the last survey at the mouth of the Columbia River, namely, in June, 1907, shows that the least depth is 25½ feet. I read from page 774 of volume 2 of the last report of the Chief of Engineers the following:

There is a tendency to shoal in the vicinity of the channel used for two years past and there is no longer any decided depression across the bar at this point, as there was a year ago.

To the southwest about 7,000 feet of the bar crest is beginning to yield to the increased scour which the incomplete jetty extension has set up, and within this distance there are four distinct depressions or channels—24, 24½, 25½, and 25½ feet deep at low water, respectively, at the shoalest points. The deepest of these channels are 4,000 feet apart and the lesser channels are between these two.

But if the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey had simply taken occasion and time to look at the last map issued under his supervision, he would have found that there are two channels at the mouth of the Columbia, the least depth in each at lowest low tide being 25 feet. One of them is buoyed, and in that one a depth of 25 feet is the least shown, and that low depth continues less than a mile, the rest of the channel being all the way from 30 to 40 and 50 feet and even greater depths, and this, remember, is at lowest low tide, and the rise is 7 feet, giving at mean high tide at least 32 feet of water.

I can not understand why such a statement should have been given out, or why, when his attention had been called to it by the Senator from California, the Superintendent should not have taken pains to go to the records and ascertain the exact facts. Carelessness in making statements of that character which reflect on the commercial resources and advantages of a great port is inexcusable.

I find also in a publication issued by the Light-House Board, entitled "Lights, Buoys, and Daymarks on the Pacific Coast," at page 55, this statement in regard to the Columbia River:

The last official survey shows a depth of 21 feet at low water in this channel across the bar.

There is no official survey, and there is no character of survey that gives any such figures. The last official survey, as I have shown, and as it is extended on the map issued by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, shows that the least depth of water in the two channels is at the lowest low tide 25 and 25½ feet, with a rise at mean high tide of 7 feet. So far as the depth of water in the river is concerned, I have received a telegram from the engineer who is in charge of improvements there, dated at Portland, Oreg., on yesterday, addressed to the Chief of Engineers in response to a telegram which I sent the local engineer, in which he says:

PORTLAND, OREG., April 30, 1908.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.:

Please forward this telegram to Senator FULTON in answer to his telegram of this morning. Last survey Columbia River bar made June, 1907. This survey showed the river to be making new channel across bar well to south of channel of previous year. Though there was shown to be several channels having 25½ feet depth at low water, they were regarded as too narrow for practical use, and safe depth was assumed to be 24 feet at low water. It is expected that survey of the coming June will show further improvement in depth and width of new channel. Summer freshet of Columbia has begun, giving depths much above normal between Portland and Astoria. River pilots report safe depth of 28 feet all way to Portland at present time.

ROESSLER, Engineers.

3.18 p. m.

And vessels drawing 25 feet and over have for years been entering the Columbia River, ascending to Portland, loading to that depth, and going to sea.

But my principal purpose, Mr. President, in calling this matter up was to show that the Senator from California was in no wise to blame for the statement which appeared in the RECORD. He used due caution and care in securing the data and was justified in relying on it and assuming it to be true. It is therefore unjust to him that he should be subjected to criticism. The criticism, whatever is to be uttered, should be directed to the officials who, through carelessness, have misrepresented the facts to the injury and to the detriment of an important commercial river and a great commercial port.

SUSPENSION OF COMMODITY CLAUSE, INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. ELKINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution and the report of the committee may be read. It is very short.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read, at the request of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the failure of any railroad company, prior to May 1, 1910, to comply with that provision of section 1 of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," which reads as follows: "From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier," shall not be held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to May 1, 1910, to the penalties, fines, or forfeitures now provided by law for violations of said act to regulate commerce, or any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed to prevent the bringing of any civil suit or proceeding for the enforcement of said provision or the prevention of violations thereof.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a committee amendment, I understand.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have the report read; it is very short.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. ELKINS on April 6, 1908, as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Committee, to whom was referred Senate joint resolution No. 74, submit the following:

The committee report the resolution favorably with one amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 13, after the words "prior to," strike out the word "May" and insert the word "January."

Accompanying this report is a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, dated April 2, 1908, recommending the passage of this resolution.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 2, 1908.

DEAR SIR: The Interstate Commerce Commission has the honor to submit the following in response to the request of your committee of this date for a report on Senate resolution No. 74, a copy of which was transmitted with your letter.

Without attempting to recite our reasons or otherwise discuss the matter, I am authorized to say that the Commission approves this resolution and would favor its adoption. This is the view of all the members of the Commission except one, who is now absent on official business, but it is believed that he would concur in the foregoing if he were here to be consulted.

Very respectfully,
MARTIN A. KNAPP,
Chairman.

Hon. STEPHEN B. ELKINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a few days ago, when this joint resolution was presented and unanimous consent was asked for its consideration by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] I objected, stating that, so far as I was personally concerned, I would object to unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution unless certain legislation was brought from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which reference was made. I have not changed my mind in that respect at all; but this joint resolution has been brought before the Senate, not by unanimous consent, but by the adoption of the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to take it up for consideration.

The act which this resolution seeks to amend was adopted on June 29, 1906, and the paragraph of the act, known as the "rate act," which is sought to be amended is this:

From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined, or produced by it, or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

That provision of the act was suggested by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the New Haven Railroad against the Interstate Commerce Commission, reported in 200 United States Reports. It was also suggested in the opinion of the circuit court of appeals in a case in which Mr. Chief Justice Fuller presided. It was also recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its report to Congress on January 25, 1907, in this language:

Fourth. That carriers engaged in interstate commerce be forbidden after reasonable time to own or have any interest, directly or indirectly, in any operated coal properties, except such as are exclusively for their own fuel supply, and that ownership, either directly or indirectly, by officers or employees of any common carriers of any coal properties or any of the stock of coal companies along the line of road by which they are employed be forbidden.

That was forbidden by the act of June 29, 1906, to the extent provided in the act, after elaborate discussion in this Chamber, and it was forbidden upon grounds of public policy which are undeniable, I think. The railroads were given from June 29, 1906, until the 1st day of May, 1908, to prepare themselves for this change of attitude with reference to coal and other commodities to be transported by them and owned by them. After the expiration of that year and a half we are asked to extend it two years more. There has been absolutely no reason given either by the committee which has this matter in charge or by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to which the joint resolution was referred.

It goes without saying, Mr. President, that any Senator in this body, if it were necessary and adequate reasons were given, would favor as an independent proposition, disconnected from any legislation that might be pending, the giving of a reasonable time for the railroads in good faith to adjust themselves to this law. My purpose in rising now is to ask the Senator from West Virginia to state to the Senate the reasons, if there be any, why this extension of time to the railroads should be granted; and if he is able to state a reason, then it is for the Senate to say whether it is sufficient; and so far as I am concerned, I reserve the right to pass upon the sufficiency of any reason that may be suggested. The committee have made a report, and what is it? Nothing more than the transmission of a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, a portion of which I will read in order that the Senate may understand how indefinite, so far as the facts are concerned, is the recommendation:

Without attempting to recite our reasons or otherwise discuss the matter, I am authorized to say that the Commission approves this resolution and would favor its adoption.

The committee give no reasons. The Interstate Commerce Commission decline to state the reasons upon which their recommendation is based. No Senator in this body has heretofore given, so far as I am aware, any reason why this extension of time should be granted, and I submit that the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of the committee, who has charge of the joint resolution, ought to state some facts which will give the Senate an opportunity to pass upon the question whether or not there are any considerations upon which this law should be suspended for two years more.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to him to answer the question generally.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, there has been no opportunity afforded any Senator on the floor or any member of the committee to give any reasons. That is the only reason none has been given. This is the only opportunity which has been afforded to explain the reasons to the Senate, and I am indebted to the Senator from Texas for his courtesy in allowing me, in the midst of his remarks, to explain the matter, which I will do, in answer to his question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not intend to make any remarks, except to state these preliminary facts and to ask the Senator then to state the reasons, if there are any, for the proposed extension of time.

Mr. ELKINS. I was only waiting for the Senator to conclude.

Mr. President, the joint resolution does not repeal the law. It only suspends the penalties, which are very heavy and very severe, according to the amendment of the committee, until twenty months from the 1st of May—that is to-day. The reason that moved the committee to report the joint resolution favorably—and I think it actuated the Interstate Commerce Commission—is the condition of the country. The railroads find that we are following in the wake of a most disastrous panic. They have been unable to find money or to find purchasers who could pay for these coal lands. They must be separated. The railroads have been unable to make the necessary financial arrangements. They have been trying to make them. A great many legal questions are involved.

Take the old coal-hauling railroads in the East, organized in the early history of railroad building. In order to induce the building of railroads, those railroad companies were provided with special charters, or at least a number of them were, which authorized them to acquire coal lands and to mortgage the coal lands along with the railroad property proper in order to raise the necessary capital to build and extend the lines. The coal lands so acquired were mortgaged, and again and again mortgaged. It is a great undertaking to separate, according to the requirements of the commodity clause, the coal lands from the railroads, so that the railroads shall not have any interest, directly or indirectly, in transporting the commodities.

Mr. President, I think if the recent panic had not come on with such severity most of the railroads would have been enabled to make the necessary financial arrangements to comply with the act of Congress. I do not seek, nor does the committee ask, a repeal of this provision, but simply to extend the time. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when the safety-appliance bill was passed five years were given to the railroads, because it was an expensive thing to comply with the law. The expiration of that time unfortunately fell, just as the expiration of limitation does here, at a time when the country was following in the throes of a panic, when there was great business and financial depression in the country; and I believe without a word of objection, on the report of the committee, following something like this, by a simple joint resolution, the time to comply with the law was extended. At the end of two years substantially all the railroads in the United States had complied with the law.

All that is asked here is that considering the recent panic, the financial depression—and I do not think it is unreasonable—the railroads shall have time to settle the legal questions and the financial propositions involved, and find the capital necessary to separate these great interests.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from West Virginia makes the suggestion that the railroad companies ought to have time to settle the legal questions. I do not want to make any improper inquiry of the Senator, but I will ask him, in view of his statement, if there is any disposition on the part of the railroads to seek this extension of time, in order that they may make a test of this question in the courts? Does that enter into the purpose of the railroad companies?

Mr. ELKINS. Not that. The legal questions that I referred to are simply these: Take the Delaware and Lackawanna, the Lehigh Valley, the Reading, the Pennsylvania, and other coal roads under charters especially granted by the legislatures of the respective States that have been given power to own coal lands, and having that power, which was granted and exercised in order to raise funds, they mortgaged the property of the railroads along with the coal lands. It is a delicate question, where some of the roads have four mortgages, to get rid of those mortgages. The $500,000,000 or $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 of bonds rest upon the coal lands just as they do upon the railroads proper. There are a great many legal questions involved. Some of them will have to be settled by the courts. The railroads have taken it up in good fashion and earnestly, and are trying to make the necessary arrangements. That is the legal question I referred to. No other legal questions at all are involved.

Under the joint resolution time is given and there is a suspension of the penalties for twenty months. In the meantime, under the suggestion of the Attorney-General, following the recommendation of the Commission, ample provision is made to test the law. The Government could not test it until May 1. There was no way in which to do it.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question in order to ascertain the good faith of the railroads. What have they done? Have any of these coal lands been alienated? Have any of the railroads in the country divested themselves of these possesions which are prohibited? What are the facts? I ask that in order to show the good faith.

Mr. ELKINS. Some of the railroads, where the difficulties were not so great—I may cite the case of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. They were in a condition where they had only one mortgage, and it was a recent one, and they were not under the ancient rights guaranteed by special charters, as I understand, empowering them to own such properties, but were under the general incorporation law. Their case was easier, and the Baltimore and Ohio proceeded at once. But I am informed by some of the Baltimore and Ohio officials that they have some doubt whether what they have done is entirely legal or not. They think it is, and they hope it is, but they were hurried.

In the case of the other great roads which I have mentioned, with charters fifty years old, and these ancient rights and these mortgages which have been piled upon them, it is not an easy question, legally or financially, to separate these properties. I think the railroads want to do it. I think in good times they would have found a way to comply with the law. I think the Supreme Court of the United States, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has well said, in the Chesapeake and Ohio case, decided they could not do this and should not do this, and upon that the commodity clause was drawn when the rate bill was under consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was the case of the New Haven Railroad——

Mr. ELKINS. The Chesapeake and Ohio was involved.

Mr. CULBERSON. On circuit, in an opinion by Judge Goff, I think—a trial over which Mr. Chief Justice Fuller presided.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, partly from the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia and also from what has appeared in the public press, the railroads are going to contest the right of Congress to enact this legislation. As long as they appear in that attitude and deny our power to enact this legislation, why should we give them this extension?

Mr. ELKINS. Let me interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. In the case of the safety-appliance act, to which reference has been made, the companies did not propose to litigate the question. They came here and asked for an extension.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me answer.

Mr. NELSON. If the roads would come here and say in good faith, "We will comply with this law just as soon as we can, and we will not dispute its validity, but we want to dispose of our property," it would be another matter.

Really, what they want is the opportunity to litigate this question and to defeat the power of Congress to enact such legislation. Coming in this attitude, I submit they are not entitled to any special favor.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I think the Government is prepared to proceed in a way under the suggestion of the Attorney-General, which perhaps the Senator has not read, against the railroads for the first violation of the law. The railroads find themselves in this situation. On the first of May they can not make this arrangement. The Attorney-General suggests that that being the case, if the joint resolution passes, he be put in position to enforce the law. The railroads have asked for no suspension of the law.

Mr. NELSON. No; but what I want to say to the Senator is this: When the railroads come in here and ask us to give them an extension of time, a favor, they ought, in connection with that, express a willingness to comply with the law. They ought to say to Congress, "We will not dispute the validity of this law and are ready to comply with it as soon as we can get an opportunity to dispose of our property." But their attitude now is that they want time in which to dispute and contest the validity of this provision of the act of Congress. That is the attitude in which they appear. If these great railroad companies will come here and say to us, "We are willing to comply with this provision of the act of Congress—the letter and spirit of it—if you will only give us time to dispose of our property; we do not intend to contest the right of Congress; we only ask for this extension," then they would be entitled to some favor. Otherwise they are not, if we have to litigate this question. If they are going to dispute the right of Congress to enact such legislation, let the law remain as it is and let them contest it.

Mr. ELKINS. The railroads——

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. DEPEW. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Are not the people interested in this matter? Under the law as it stands to-day is not every carload of railroad-owned coal which is shipped across the boundary of a State shipped in violation of the law, and does not the railroad company and its officers become liable to penalties if they ship out of the State a pound of such coal under any exigency?

Mr. ELKINS. After to-day.

Mr. DEPEW. After to-day.

Mr. ELKINS. Beginning with to-day.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, if I understand the law, the property of the railroad companies is not confiscated on the 1st of May. They can retain their coal fields. They can retain their lumber plants. They simply are not allowed to transport over their lines the products of those mines or the timber products manufactured by them.

Mr. ELKINS. That is it.

Mr. CLAY. It was wise to prevent railroad companies from owning coal lands and shipping their own coal in competition with private citizens, because the railroads would always furnish cars to its own officers and the owners of these coal mines, to the detriment of the private citizen. What the railroads have to do in this case is to cease to ship. After the 1st of May they can retain their coal fields, they can retain their lumber plants, and they can sell the products without shipping the products, and will be allowed years within which to do it.

None of their property will be confiscated by reason of this fact. After the 1st of May the private citizen can get cars for the purpose of shipping his coal. The reason why this law was passed is that heretofore the private citizen's property was practically destroyed by reason of the fact that a railroad used its cars in order to ship its own coal at an unreasonably low price and practically confiscated the mines of many private citizens. The property of the railroad companies can not be injured; only they can not, by shipping it over their own lines, utilize it after this date. But they can sell it within twenty months or three or four or five years.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree entirely with the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I merely want to ask the Senator whether he still adheres to what I understood was his purpose when this matter was last before the Senate, to offer the amendment prepared by the Attorney-General? I was waiting until he did offer it. After that the debate might be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. ELKINS. I am going to come to that, but the Senator from Texas asked a question, and I want to answer the question, and then I shall move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator from West Virginia will pardon me for an interruption, in the first place I want to invite attention to the fact that the Senator from Georgia inadvertently referred to the manufactured products of timber, when they are excepted.

Mr. CLAY. I believe the Senator from Texas is correct. Timber is excepted, and the railroads, under the present law, are allowed to transport anything they may need for the purpose of keeping up or constructing their roads. They are not prohibited in any way from transporting timber or coal or anything else which they may need for the purpose of operating their own roads. I think the Senator from Texas is correct.

Mr. CULBERSON. The other purpose I had in rising was to suggest, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, that what I believe the Senate desires now, at this preliminary stage, is a full statement from the Senator from West Virginia, in view of the absence of that in any report, showing that there is some reason for this additional time to be given to the railroad companies to carry out the law.

Mr. ELKINS. I was trying to make that statement.

Mr. CULBERSON. When that statement is made, I beg leave to suggest to the Senator that the joint resolution ought to be perfected, and then the substitute proposed by the Senator from Ohio could fittingly be considered.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree, Mr. President.

Now, let me answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The railroads do not come here in any attitude of hostility to this law. To-day, not being able to comply with the law in the time prescribed, every railroad that hauls its own coal is subject to a penalty of $5,000. The bondholders of the railroads have a right to interpose in the State courts and in the United States courts in this matter. It is not the railroads. All the railroads say is, "We find ourselves unable to comply with this law, for the reason that there is a business depression, a great panic. We have just come through a great panic." I think that is entirely reasonable, Mr. President.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has stated the reason for the law, which is a good one—to prevent railroads from transporting their own commodities in competition with the individual shipper, with the small producer, with the independent coal operator. The Senate passed that law unanimously and the railroads have not, so far as I know and so far as the Interstate Commerce Commission has reported, interposed any objection to it or any disposition to fight the law. They do not have to fight, I will tell the Senator from Minnesota. The Government will begin proceedings at once against the railroads. The bondholders are trying, and I believe some have begun proceedings, such as they could under the law, to find out what the rights of the bondholders are under special charters of the respective States, whether or not this act sets aside the special acts of the legislatures granted fifty years ago——

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is nothing in this law which prevents the railroad companies, the owners of mines, from operating the mines?

Mr. ELKINS. Nothing, I believe.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then there is nothing to prevent them from producing coal and nothing to prevent them from selling that coal after they have produced it.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Only they can not ship it as their own property. They can sell it to any other dealer and he can ship it over their line of railroad, paying the same freight that any other person would.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. How will that conflict with any bonds that have been given upon both the railroad and the coal fields? Is there anything in the bonds that compels the railway companies to operate the mines and also to ship the particular coal produced from those fields?

Mr. ELKINS. I understand there are all sorts of questions involved under the ancient charters of these States. Here is what makes it dangerous, answering the Senator's question: Any railroad officer violating the law subjects himself or his company to a fine of $5,000. Let me read the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. He does not subject himself to the fine if he operates the mines and sells the coal.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me read the law:

> From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority—> or which it may own in whole or in part or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect.

That covers your statement—

There might be an indirect interest here if they sold to somebody. They would have to sell in good faith. Suppose in good faith they leased the mines. Some of them have tried that. The Baltimore and Ohio got up some legal machinery by which they divested themselves of, I should think, twenty-five or thirty million dollars of property. It was very difficult to do it on the ground that they might have an indirect interest in it. The question of leases has been considered, whether a railroad could lease its coal lands to a third party, still retaining an indirect interest.

Mr. McCUMBER. That, I understand, would be true, but does the Senator contend that a fair construction of the law would mean that if the railroad company mined its own coal and sold the coal to another individual, absolutely independent——

Mr. ELKINS. In good faith.

Mr. McCUMBER. And absolutely in good faith; that that person could not ship the coal over the line of that railroad?

Mr. ELKINS. But here comes in another question. That coal has been mortgaged, and if the railroad company sold it to another party, the money perhaps would go to satisfy the mortgage. There comes in a legal question, a difficult question. There might be an indirect interest retained by the railroad company. Let me tell the Senator that in these times twenty-five or thirty or forty or fifty million dollars are not picked up every day or any day to pay the railroads in good faith for coal lands, and it is hard for the railroads to find a purchaser for them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate the fact that it would probably be impossible to sell under present conditions.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I can not conceive that it would be impossible to mine.

Mr. ELKINS. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nor impossible to sell wholesale at their mines to independent dealers.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then if they have the right to sell, they would have the right to ship over their own line property that belonged to an independent dealer, and their bondholders could have no objection. It would be no more an interference with any agreement in their bonds to sell immediately than it would be to sell——

Mr. ELKINS. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. At the end of the route over which the coal was transported.

Mr. ELKINS. But there are all sorts of questions.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. Does the Senator think that a railroad owning mines, only accessible to that one road, can avoid the law by selling to Smith or Jones the product it mines with the intention on the part of Smith or Jones, after buying the coal, to ship it out over that road and sell it? Would it not be considered as evading the law or engaging in a conspiracy to evade the law? It would be perfectly evident that the party who bought the coal and shipped it out over the railroad intended to ship it over that line. Where is the difference between the company mining the product and itself shipping it, or shipping it out through such a purchaser?

Mr. McCUMBER. That simply raises the question of the ability to perpetrate a fraud. I do not think the Senator would contend that the fact standing alone that they had mined the coal themselves and had sold it to a person who shipped it over their line would be any evidence of fraud of itself, or any evidence that they had an interest in it. I simply maintain, as I understand the law, that the law does not contemplate that the railway company owning mines can not operate those mines and sell that coal at the mines to independent dealers who may ship it over their line of railway. I can see very easily that it places them in a position where they might be under a suspicion, possibly, that it would give them an opportunity to perpetrate a fraud as against the law, but I am speaking of the fact, and not of the mere opportunity to commit a fraud.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to state a case? For instance, here is a corporation which owns very large coal mines. There are no other mines near it. They are supplying and have been supplying a great area of country. Along comes the 1st of May. If it may appear that somebody is buying thousands of tons of coal from the railroad company and shipping it over the road and supplying these same customers, is it not on the face of it an avoidance of the law?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would say that it is not an avoidance of the law upon the face of it. It may or it may not be.

Mr. ELKINS. If I may be allowed to have the amendments acted upon, I will thank Senators.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ELKINS. Let the Secretary read the committee amendment and then another amendment, and then the joint resolution will be before the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, strike out "May" and insert "January," so as to read, "prior to January 1, 1910."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. Now I offer the amendment which was before the committee. It is the suggestion of the Attorney-General of the United States, in his letter dated April 8, that the proviso at the end of the joint resolution be stricken out and a proviso inserted, which I will ask be read by the Secretary and adopted.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, before that is read I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. We are all expected here to rely more or less upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for all the facts that pertain to the running of railroads in this country. Now, as the letter favoring this legislation that has been sent to the committee by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as read by the Senator from Texas, discloses no reason for favoring this legislation, I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he is informed of the reason which actuated the Interstate Commerce Commission in favoring the legislation. I presume they have reasons or they would not recommend it, and we ought to know them. They ought not to write a letter and decline to give the reasons. I suppose that the Senator is possessed of those reasons, and I ask him if he will give the Senate the benefit of them.

Mr. ELKINS. I tried to state that it was more particularly the state of the country—the financial condition of the country. There is no other reason in the world than that the railroad companies could not find purchasers for their coal lands.

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me. I understood the Senator to give that as his reason for favoring it, but do I understand now that that is the reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission favors it?

Mr. ELKINS. In talking with the chairman, that was the only reason that was given, and no other was needed. I do not know of any other reason, except that at this moment railroad companies can not find purchasers for their coal lands, so as to comply with the law in good faith. Some of them did, I will say to the Senator. The Baltimore and Ohio, the greatest coal shipper, I believe, of all, did not have as many legal complications as others, and they did it before the panic.

Now, let me ask Senators to allow this amendment to be voted on, and then I can make a further statement, if it is desired.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly; I did not want to interrupt the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning with line 17, strike out the proviso at the end of the joint resolution and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed to prevent the bringing of any civil suit or proceeding for the enforcement of said provision, or the prevention or violations thereof; and the Attorney-General is hereby authorized to institute, or cause to be instituted, in the name of the United States and against any persons or corporations failing to comply with said provision, such civil suit, whether by application for mandamus, bill in equity for injunction, or other effective remedy in the premises, in any circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction in the premises, to secure the enforcement and observance of said provision; and the respective parties to any such suit herein authorized to be commenced shall enjoy the right of appeal, as in suits of like character when instituted by the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the observance of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. ELKINS. Before the amendment is voted on I should like to have the letter of the Attorney-General, which transmitted that suggestion, to be read to the Senate, so that the two may go together.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1908.

Hon. STEPHEN B. ELKINS, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to S. R. 74, introduced by you on the 31st ultimo. In view of the fact that some difference of opinion seems to exist as to whether any appropriate civil remedy exists to enforce the provisions of the "commodities clause" of the Hepburn Act, as the law now stands, I venture to suggest that the above-mentioned resolution be amended by adding to it the words following:

"Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed to prevent the bringing of any civil suit or proceeding for the enforcement of said provision or the prevention of violations thereof; and the Attorney-General is hereby authorized to institute, or cause to be instituted, in the name of the United States and against any persons or corporations failing to comply with said provision, such civil suit, whether by application for mandamus, bill in equity for injunction, or other effective remedy in the premises, in any circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction in the premises, to secure the enforcement and observance of said provision; and the respective parties to any such suit herein authorized to be commenced shall enjoy the right of appeal, as in suits of like character when instituted by the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the observance of the interstate-commerce law."

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES J. BONAPARTE,
Attorney-General.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to this particular amendment, I will state to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought that the Senator from West Virginia wanted the Senate to act on the amendment so that he might perfect the joint resolution and have it in the form in which he wants to present it to the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. That is what I wanted.

Mr. FORAKER. He has not yet been able to do it. As soon as it is done, I will say to the Senator from Texas, I want to offer a substitute for the perfected joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. I so understood and I stated that a while ago. I rise to this particular amendment in view of suggesting an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to offer a substitute.

Mr. CULBERSON. After the joint resolution is perfected?

Mr. FORAKER. Of course; I will not offer it until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have not a copy of the proviso submitted by the Attorney-General, except as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 5545. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia this amendment, which I regard as necessary. It reads:

Or other effective remedy in the premises, in any circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction.

I suggest to the Senator to strike out the word "having" and insert "which said court shall have."

Mr. ELKINS. I accept that.

Mr. CULBERSON. Otherwise it depends upon existing law, and that law, I think, is confined to mandamus, as will appear by section 20.

Mr. ELKINS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10 of the amendment, before the word "jurisdiction," strike out "having" and insert in lieu the words "which said court shall have."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, there is one other suggestion of amendment that I wish to make, if the Senator from West Virginia will permit it. The word "request" appears in the last clause "when instituted by the request of the the Interstate Commerce Commission." I suggest that the words "the request" be stricken out and the words "or on behalf" be inserted, so that it will read:

And the respective parties to any such suit herein authorized to be commenced shall enjoy the right of appeal, as in suits of like character when instituted by or on behalf of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the observance of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. ELKINS. I accept that amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an additional amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the proviso, line 1, strike out the words "the request" and insert "or on behalf."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator from Ohio will excuse me further, I am seeking to perfect the joint resolution so that his substitute will then be in order. I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the peculiar wording of the joint resolution at the beginning:

That the failure of any railroad company, prior to May 1, 1910.

And on page 2 the joint resolution continues:

Shall not be held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to January 1, 1910.

The difference between May and January seems not to have been considered. I think these dates ought to be reconciled.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me say to the Senator that it was contemplated to make the extension two years, and the committee voted to make it twenty months. The object of the amendment in line 13, page 2, striking out "May" and inserting "January," was to reduce the time to twenty months instead of two years.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not understand how it can be that way. It says "that the failure of any railroad company, prior to May 1, 1910, to comply with that provision of section 1," and so forth, "shall not he held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to January 1, 1910." It ought to be January or May in both places.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me suggest to the Senator that to strike out "May" on the first page of the joint resolution and insert "January" will make the twenty months, which was the purpose of the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think that would do, because the act became operative the 1st of May.

Mr. ELKINS. January is past, too. From May 1, 1908, to January 1, 1910, is just twenty months, the way the committee figured it, and that was the purpose of the committee. But as it was drawn it gave two years.

Mr. CULBERSON. The more material matter to which I now call attention is the language found on page 2:

Shall not be held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to January 1, 1910, to the penalties, fines, or forfeitures now provided by law for vialations of said act to regulate commerce, or any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

That will relieve the railroad companies, if it remains as it is written here, free within this time from the penalties for the violation of said act or any part of it.

I therefore suggest to the Senator, on line 15, page 2, the addition of the words "of said provision," so that it will read:

Shall not be held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to January 1, 1910, to the penalties, fines, or forfeitures now provided by law for violations of said provision of said act.

Otherwise they will be relieved against the violation of any provision of the entire act.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that, from my reading of the provision as it stands, there are no penalties. I have been giving some consideration to it during the discussion. If the Senator will refer to the provision which is at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3, I look in vain for any penalties. I think the reference must be had to the general act. The provision is at the bottom of page 2 and top of page 3, in Public Document 337, which I just obtained through a page. There is some deficiency there—some oversight.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not catch the significance of the suggestion of the Senator. I was diverted by Senators around me.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator from Texas to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that the language of the joint resolution on page 2, line 15, should refer to the forfeiture now provided by law for violations of said provision, instead of violations of said act. I understood that to be the suggestion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I was calling the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that in the act that it is sought to amend there are no penalties provided.

Mr. ELKINS. It is the general penalty clause.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the reason why I was calling the attention of the Senator from Texas to it. If we would use the word "provision" or "paragraph," or whatever we might use, then it would refer to something that did not exist.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia to read the section of the act of June 29, 1906, as to the penalties.

Mr. ELKINS. It is under the general penalty clause, I think, of $5,000 for each offense. I will read it in a moment. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, and he is an able lawyer, is correct about this provision. We want to get it right.

Mr. CULBERSON. We do not want to pass any law that will relieve the railroad companies from the penalties of the entire act.

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all.

Mr. CULBERSON. We only want to relieve them, if we relieve them at all, against the penalties for violating this provision.

Mr. ELKINS. That is all. The general penalties follow this provision, I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; if we add the word "provision," there being no penalties prescribed in the provision referred to, then there would be no penalty.

Mr. CULBERSON. The general provisions for general penalties reach back and apply to each separate provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Texas will read over the first part of the joint resolution he will find that the language is absolutely correct. It reads:

That the failure of any railroad company, prior—

As it should be amended—to January 1, 1910, to comply with that provision of section 1 of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to amend an act"—

And so forth, which reads as follows:

From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber—

And so forth—

or produced by it—

And so forth—

shall not be held or deemed to subject the railroad company so violating said provision prior to January 1, 1910, to the penalties, fines, or forfeitures now provided by law for violations of said act—

Now, the violation of that single provision shall not subject the company to the penalties for the violations of the act. There being but one general penalty for the violation of the act, and this relating only to the violation of a particular provision, not to subject it to that penalty for such violation, it seems to me, is absolutely correct and the way it should be.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, if there is no amendment pending, I wish to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. NELSON. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Texas is pending. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Texas that he put his amendment in this form: Strike out the word "law," in line 15, and insert the words "said act," and then strike out the word "act" further on in the same line and insert the word "provision," so that it will read:

Or forfeitures now provided by said act for violations of said provision.

I think that would make it clear and logical.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think that would have the same identical effect. I am not concerned about the particular language, just so the object is reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, strike out the word "law" and insert "said act," and after the word "said," in the same line, strike out the word "act" and insert in lieu thereof the word "provision."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, let the question be taken on the proviso.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia moves to strike out the proviso beginning in line 17 on page 2 and to insert in lieu of it the proviso which has been read.

Mr. ELKINS. As amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon proposes an amendment to the text.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I believe a mistake has been made, and I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to it. In the first line of the joint resolution, on the first page, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I think that ought to be made "January." Is that not true? The Senator made the suggestion. I overlooked it. I think it ought to read "prior to January 1, 1910."

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; I made that suggestion.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have "May" stricken out and "January" inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, strike out "May" and insert "January."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. Now, let my amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution insert the following:

That section 6 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the Commission created by this act and print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing all the rates, fares, and charges for transportation between different points on its own route and between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by railroad, by pipe line, or by water when a through route and joint rate have been established. If no joint rate over the through route has been established, the several carriers in such through route shall file, print, and keep open to public inspection as aforesaid, the separately established rates, fares, and charges applied to the through transportation. The schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately all terminal charges, storage charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the Commission may require, all privileges or facilities granted or allowed, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, and charges, or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee. Such schedules shall be plainly printed in large type, and copies for the use of the public shall be kept posted in two public and conspicuous places in every depot, station, or office of such carrier where passengers or freight, respectively, are received for transportation, in such form that they shall be accessible to the public and can be conveniently inspected. The provisions of this section shall apply to all traffic, transportation, and facilities defined in this act.

"Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act receiving freight in the United States to be carried through a foreign country to any place in the United States shall also in like manner print and keep open to public inspection, at every depot or office where such freight is received for shipment, schedules showing the through rates established and charged by such common carrier to all points in the United States beyond the foreign country to which it accepts freight for shipment; and any freight shipped from the United States through a foreign country into the United States, the through rate on which shall not have been made public, as required by this act, shall, before it is admitted into the United States from said foreign country, be subject to customs duties as if said freight were of foreign production.

"No change shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges, or joint rates, fares, and charges which have been filed and published by any common carrier in compliance with the requirements of this section, except after thirty days' notice to the Commission and to the public, published as aforesaid, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in force and the time when the changed rates, fares, or charges will go into effect; and the proposed changes shall be shown by printing new schedules, or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept open to public inspection: Provided, That the Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than the notice herein specified, or modify the requirements of this section in respect to publishing, posting, and filing of tariffs, either in particular instances or by a general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions: Provided further, That at any time prior to the expiration of the notice herein required to be given of a proposed increase of rates, fares, or charges, or of joint rates, fares, or charges, any shipper or any number of shippers, jointly or severally, may file with the Commission a protest, in writing, against the proposed increase in whole or in part, stating succinctly the grounds of his or their objections to the proposed change. Upon the filing of such protest the Commission may, in its discretion, make and enter an order directing that the then existing rate or rates, fare or fares, charge or charges, proposed to be changed and protested against as aforesaid, shall continue in force until the reasonableness of the rate or rates, fare or fares, charge or charges, proposed to be substituted shall have been determined by the Commission, and thereupon the proposed increase shall not take effect or go into force until approved by the Commission after a hearing as herein provided for. Upon the filing of such protest, a copy thereof shall be mailed by the Secretary of the Commission to the carrier or carriers proposing the change and thereafter the Commission shall proceed to hear and determine the matter in all respects as it is required to do by sections 13 and 15 of this act, in case of a complaint made because of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier, as provided in said section 13; but throughout the proceeding the burden of proof shall be on the carrier proposing the change, to show that the rate, fare, or charge proposed to be substituted is just and reasonable.

"The names of the several carriers which are parties to any joint tariff shall be specified therein, and each of the parties thereto, other than the one filing the same, shall file with the Commission such evidence of concurrence therein or acceptance thereof as may be required or approved by the Commission, and where such evidence of concurrence or acceptance is filed it shall not be necessary for the carriers filing the same to also file copies of the tariffs in which they are named as parties.

"Every common carrier subject to this act shall also file with said Commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party.

"The Commission may determine and prescribe the form in which the schedules required by this section to be kept open to public inspection shall be prepared and arranged and may change the form from time to time as shall be found expedient.

"No carrier, unless otherwise provided by this act, shall engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this act; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs: Provided, That wherever the word 'carrier' occurs in this act it shall be held to mean 'common carrier.'

"That in time of war or threatened war preference and precedence shall, upon the demand of the President of the United States, be given, over all other traffic, to the transportation of troops and material of war, and carriers shall adopt every means within their control to facilitate and expedite the military traffic.

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," approved February 19, 1903, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act, shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons, except as such penalties are herein changed. The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts, or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law, shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense; and it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced. Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall knowingly offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000: Provided, That any person, or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall, in addition to the fine herein provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Every violation of this section shall be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed, or through which the transportation may have been conducted; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

"In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper, as well as that of the person. Whenever any carrier files with the Interstate Commerce Commission or publishes a particular rate under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or acts amendatory thereof, or participates in any rates so filed or published, that rate as against such carrier, its officers or agents, in any prosecution begun under this act shall be conclusively deemed to be the legal rate, and any departure from such rate, or any offer to depart therefrom, shall be deemed to be an offense under this section of this act.

"Any person, corporation, or company who shall deliver property for interstate transportation to any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom as consignor or consignee any such carrier shall transport property from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or foreign country, who shall knowingly, by employee, agent, officer, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, by or through any means or device whatsoever, receive or accept from such common carrier any sum of money or any other valuable consideration as a rebate or offset against the regular charges for transportation of such property, as fixed by the schedules of rates provided for in this act, shall in addition to any penalty provided by this act forfeit to the United States a sum of money three times the amount of money so received or accepted and three times the value of any other consideration so received or accepted, to be ascertained by the trial court; and the Attorney-General of the United States is authorized and directed, whenever he has reasonable grounds to believe that any such person, corporation, or company has knowingly received or accepted from any such common carrier any sum of money or other valuable consideration as a rebate or offset as aforesaid, to institute in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction a civil action to collect the said sum or sums so forfeited as aforesaid; and in the trial of said action all such rebates or other considerations so received or accepted for a period of six years prior to the commencement of the action may be included therein, and the amount recovered shall be three times the total amount of money or three times the total value of such consideration so received or accepted, or both, as the case may be."

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. ELKINS. The amendment which has just been read is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The amendment which has just been offered as a substitute by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] is a very long amendment.

Mr. FULTON. It is not offered as a substitute. It is simply offered as an amendment. It is a long one, as the Senator says. Was the Senator from Ohio going to make a suggestion?

Mr. FORAKER. I was in error in saying that the amendment was offered as a substitute, was I?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; it is not offered as a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] is offered as an amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to say was, that if we were to discuss that amendment I think it ought to be printed. I have seen it before, but I am not sufficiently familiar with it to debate it. Some provisions in it I might find satisfactory, but it has some provisions for which I do not want to vote. I do not like to be called upon to debate it at this time.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] will permit me, I will say that it will be quite agreeable to me to have my amendment passed over for the present to be printed, if it will then be in order for other Senators to offer their amendments without displacing my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be considered as pending and the Chair will entertain the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to another portion of the joint resolution, if there be no objection.

Mr. FULTON. That will be agreeable to me.

Mr. HOPKINS. A large part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] is a repetition of section 6——

Mr. ELKINS. Of the present law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; of the present law. I should like when the amendment is printed to have the part that is new differentiated from the present law in different type, so that we can get at that without reading the whole section.

Mr. FULTON. Let the new provisions——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I would say, Mr. President, that I should like first to present my amendment, because I want the amendment stated at this time, then I shall be pleased to yield. I move to amend the joint resolution after line 2 by inserting what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the resolving clause it is proposed to insert:

That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved June 29, 1906, be amended by striking out the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," where the same appear in said section 4, and further amend said section 4 of said act by striking out all of said section 4, beginning with the words "Provided, however," said section 4 when so amended to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included in whole or in part within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I will yield to any Senator who wants to speak on any formal matter, but I would say at this time that, in my present condition, I should like to make a few remarks in regard to this joint resolution, so that, in the event of not being able to be present when it is next considered, my remarks will be uttered and in the RECORD.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if it is his purpose to strike out all of the present joint resolution after the resolving clause and to substitute what has just been read?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where does the amendment come in, then?

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment comes in after the resolving clause and precedes the present joint resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. Making a separate section?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I desire simply, Mr. President, to make the request that that portion of the amendment I have just offered which is new matter may be printed in italics and the existing law in Roman. So that it may be understood, I will say that the amendment I offer has all of the new matter printed in italics now, except some pencil interlineations in the italicized portion, which should also be printed in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my purpose in offering this amendment is to secure to the shippers of the country an advantage that it was the original intention of Congress to give them, but, unfortunately, the law was not so framed as to express that intention; in other words, this amendment is to prevent transportation companies from charging more for a short haul than for a long haul. There have been, as I find in the records of Congress, many attempts to secure more favorable tariffs for short hauls according to distance than for long hauls, but they have always failed, because it would have resulted in putting transportation upon a mileage basis, which was not practicable then and would not be practicable now. I would not favor a law that undertook to place transportation upon a mileage basis, but I know that the great majority of the people of this country insist upon their rights as against transportation companies that they should not be charged more for intermediate distances or lesser distances than is charged for longer distances.

I am going to ask that some order be maintained, because I shall speak briefly and under some difficulty, and I know that the remarks which I have to make are of interest, not only to the Senate, but to the entire country. If any member of the lawmaking body of this Congress thinks they are not of interest, let him wait until the next election and see what the people think of it.

Now, I want it impressed upon the mind of the legislative body of this country that the people are demanding that the present discrimination in favor of what are termed "terminal points" shall cease. The demand has gone forth from the commercial bodies of this country from one end of it to the other, and I have on hand a supply of reading matter on this question which would be sufficient to occupy the attention of this Senate for more days than they would be patient with the consideration of any question; and I know that many members of this body have heard from their constituents on this subject. That those living at a point 500 miles back from the seacoast should be called upon to pay for transportation upon commodities of absolute necessity in their families and in their mercantile and trade houses the rate to the coast plus the local rate back to their cities is considered an interminable burden; and yet it is the law that Congress has enacted, as it has been interpreted by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the courts, and we can not blame the courts. If we have misstated our intention in legislating, they take us at our word.

This amendment provides nothing more and nothing less than that the transportation companies shall not charge any more for the short haul than for the long where it is over the same road and includes the intermediate points. Could anything be fairer than that? I think that the framers of the law intended that it should be so.

Whenever this question has been up for discussion there has been always present or at hand those in the interest of what are known as "water points" to oppose it. This country was not intended to be a second Hawaii, which is a brown spot on the earth with a green rim around it. This country is as great in the center as it is at its circumference, and the rights of the people are just as great in one part of its geography as in another. The people know that, and they are demanding that that right be recognized. Simply because there might be water competition—that is the pretext that is put forward in justification of this law—then, forsooth, the railway company, without taking into consideration the question as to whether there is and would be water competition, is permitted, under the rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to charge a rate to the coast that is discriminatory in favor of the seaboard towns and then again to discriminate between seaboard towns.

I have here, for convenient use, data showing just what these rates are, but I will not attempt, under existing conditions, to go into the matter as fully or as much in detail as it had been my intention to do.

I introduced this amendment in the form of a bill for the attention of the Interstate Commerce Committee in the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses. It has had the pleasure of associating with the Interstate Commerce Committee during a period of about five years, and I have no doubt that the acquaintance is by this time quite intimate, but it has confined its existence to the rooms of that committee.

To the pending joint resolution, and to every bill where it may be appropriately offered as an amendment and is not subject to the rule of new legislation or the several rules that protect appropriation bills, it is my intention to get it before this body until it is rejected or accepted by a direct yea-and-nay vote by the members of this body, because it is a substantial demand and a substantial right, and one that will not be downed.

Let me illustrate it briefly. From Chicago, which is not a seaboard town and has no connection by vessel with the sea, to Portland, Oreg., which is a hundred miles back from the sea, but blessed by a splendid navigation which makes it in effect a seaboard town, we buy a cargo of goods intended for use in our homes, our mines, our mills, and on our farms and order them shipped. They go to our capital city, Boise, over the Union Pacific system, which is the Northwestern, from Chicago to Council Bluffs, and from there is the Union Pacific proper to Green River or Granger, and from there the Oregon Short Line, all of them a part of the Union Pacific system, and at Portland the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company is added to the system. The goods go over that connection of railways to Portland, Oreg., for one rate; but if you want to ship them to Boise, you pay the full rate through to Portland, Oreg., plus the local rate back from Portland, Oreg., to Boise, 514 miles. The plus rate—and by that I mean the rate back, which is a local rate and not a through rate—is in many instances more than the cost of the goods in Chicago.

The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the railroads may charge no more to Boise than they would charge to Portland, Oreg., and I use these places merely as illustrations, with no sense of invidious application whatever. The result of the discrimination is that Boise can not set up wholesale and jobbing houses in order to supply the great number of prosperous mining and other towns about it and the surrounding country, which is as thickly settled as the country around this section. She must do her wholesale and jobbing business at some seaboard town that has these terminal rates, because they have received these goods less than Boise could receive them from the East by the amount of the plus rate.

What is true under that illustration is true in every part of the United States. I will undertake to say that there is not a Senator here whose State is not the victim, in some part of its domain, of this vicious system. In the State of Massachusetts, when people living 30 miles back from Boston buy goods manufactured in the western part of their State or goods that come from our part of the country—and we ship vast quantities of wool there—they pay the rate to Boston plus the local rate from Boston back to their city, and the farther back they are from the coast the greater is this local rate which they pay, and that is added to the cost of the goods. What is the result? Why, a certain class of business that draws its raw material from the great interior of this country must necessarily establish its manufacturing industries at the terminal point. You can ship goods from Chicago to San Francisco in some instances $16 a ton cheaper than you can ship them to the eastern State line of California. Reno, Nev., is just as good an illustration as Boise, Idaho; Salt Lake City is another; Spokane, Wash., is another; Coeur d'Alene city is another. I could enumerate them on that coast by the hundred, and I could enumerate them within a hundred miles of the city of Washington by more hundreds. I think, unless Senators have had their attention drawn to this question, they do not know——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to give an example in the South of this discrimination as to one town against another, where the short haul and the long haul prevail to such an extent as to build up some towns to the detriment of others. Take the item of molasses—and, of course, the same thing applies as to other freights—the rate on molasses from New Orleans to Greensboro, N. C., is a dollar, whereas to Lynchburg, Va., some hundred miles farther north, it is only 27 cents; and freight can be shipped from Lynchburg to New Orleans and then shipped back to Greensboro and money saved on the transaction.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, you might multiply those illustrations almost without number. This is probably as large a question in the scope of its interest to the people and the effect that it has upon the prosperity and the even balance of the business of the country as ever came before either of these legislative bodies, and it is one that must not be passed over with the scant consideration that I am able to give it to-day. I am going to ask to defer the further remarks that I may make in support of this amendment until a time when I am better able physically to present them.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the joint resolution under discussion, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think it is quite obvious that the amendments here pending are so important and extensive as to require printing before they can be fully and finally considered. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, by a vote of the Senate to-day, the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, was displaced. It has developed that there will be much less debate on the bill than I anticipated, and I now rise to ask unanimous consent that after the routine morning business on Wednesday the bill be taken up, and that amendments pending and to be offered and the bill itself be voted upon before adjournment that day.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. My attention was diverted. I could not hear his request.

Mr. GALLINGER. My request is that the bill, having been displaced as the unfinished business, be taken up after the routine morning business on Wednesday, and that we vote upon the amendments pending and to be offered and the bill itself before adjournment on that day. There is to be much less debate on the bill, I will say to the Senator, than I anticipated.

Mr. BACON. I do not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 4812 be taken up for consideration immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Wednesday next, May 6, and the amendments pending and to be offered and the bill itself be voted upon before adjournment on that day. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. NELSON. I did not exactly understand the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia be taken up for consideration immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Wednesday next, May 6, and that the amendments pending and to be offered and the bill itself be voted upon before adjournment on that day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S.

4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 5 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert "Gibraltar" on page 4, line 8, after the word "Erfurt;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert "Limoges," on page 4, line 10, after "Leeds;" and the Senate agree to the same.

H. C. LODGE,
S. M. CULLOM,
A. O. BACON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. G. COUSINS,
C. B. LANDIS,
W. M. HOWARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, after the close of the routine morning business, I will submit some remarks to the Senate on the subject of the postal-savings depositories bill now on the Calendar.

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON LANDS OF FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 15641) for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, be given the same place on Monday that it occupied to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks that the bill referred to by him be given the same right on Monday next that it had to-day. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the request?

Mr. OWEN. That it retain the place it occupied to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. That it retain the same place?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. It will not interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. WARREN. The condition of that reservation is such——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY] has given notice that on Monday morning he will address the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday May 2, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 4, after the word "fractional" insert the words "and other;" and in line 8, after the word "fractional," insert the words "and other."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I would be very much obliged to the gentleman from Iowa if he would state on what ground he makes his point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will state that the ground is that it changes existing law; that it is not authorized by existing law and is not germane to the section.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question, and I do not want to be surprised to-day by having a question decided that has not been made or argued. I have recently heard a point of order made on a special ground, and after it was argued and the ground of the point of order overthrown the point of order was sustained by the Chair on another ground. The grounds now assigned are three in number, and so I hope we will try to confine ourselves to them. It is said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] that this amendment would change existing law and that it is not authorized by law. This is one and the same point, I think. He also makes the point that it is not germane to the paragraph. I would like very much to have the attention of the Chair carefully to this question, because I believe in our effort to follow a good rule we are liable to forget ourselves and make an arbitrary ruling that will defeat all attempts to amend a proposition at all. Therefore, if the Chair will indulge me, I will try to make a few suggestions on the subject.

Let me dispose of the first of the two points, as I understand them, as made by the gentleman from Iowa. It seems to be conceded now, although not formally, that this entire paragraph relating to the transportation of fractional silver coin would have been subject to a point of order because not in accordance with existing law. That is conceded by the gentleman from Iowa. Originally that was not so treated in the House in that way. Originally, under a construction given to the act relating to fractional silver coin, and the act of 1878, providing for the coinage of silver dollars, it was understood that that act—and it remains unchanged to-day—authorized the free distribution of silver dollars, and it was so ordered by circular as early as September 3, 1878, by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John Sherman. We followed that construction for a period of more than twenty years. But now we seem to have strayed from it, and it is sufficient now for my purpose to say that if this paragraph under consideration was subject to a point of order and no point of order was made against it it is subject to amendment. The precedents are all in favor of such holding.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio indulge the Chair for a moment? The gentleman cited from the statute authorizing the distribution of silver dollars. Will the gentleman kindly cite that statute to the Chair?

Mr. KEIFER. I think the Chair misunderstood me. I said the original act of 1878 was construed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John Sherman, to authorize the carriage of silver dollars free, and we followed that for many years.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that act still in force?

Mr. KEIFER. The act is still in force. Allow me to read a paragraph from a former address of mine to the Chair on substantially the same subject on January 28, 1906:

There was an act of 1853 that had some limitations. It was only for shipment to assistant treasurers and depositories and officers of the Government, but that law was amended. After the act of 1878 was passed, that provided for the coinage of silver dollars, Mr. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, in September, 1878, gave a construction to the then existing law that has never been changed, in which he said that the Government was authorized to send silver dollars out for distribution at the cost of the Government. This construction of Mr. Sherman will be found in the hearings before the subcommittee of the House of Representatives of our Committee on Appropriations.

This related to the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of this House when considering the urgent deficiency bill in the early part of the Fifty-ninth Congress. Mr. Chairman, I do not, however, need to insist upon that construction, though I believe that that great Secretary knew exactly what he was about when he gave that construction to the law of 1878, which law has not since been changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know whether or not the gentleman from Ohio believes that that statute of 1878 authorizes the transportation of coin.

Mr. KEIFER. Undoubtedly I believe that. If Secretary Sherman was right in 1878 and since, it is right now, because that act has not been repealed or modified in that respect; but for the purposes of this discussion, if it be true, as stated the other day by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], that the whole paragraph now under consideration was subject to a point of order, then it is also true and settled that being subject to a point of order and no point of order being made against it, it is now subject to amendment.

I will cite some authorities in support of that, and that will bring us to the question of whether or not the amendment proposed by me is germane. And here, Mr. Chairman, let me say that whatever limitation there is upon an amendment in an appropriation bill of this kind, or any other bill perhaps, is a matter of new parliamentary law, rule, or regulation that primarily the right to amend existed without any limitation at all. And permit me to read one single sentence from Jefferson's Manual. I read from the last Constitution, Manual, and Digest (p. 187) just a single paragraph:

Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition, by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves.

Now, it is claimed that this amendment must be germane to the paragraph, and here I want to emphasize that the practice has grown up always in the matter of construction, and recently it has been held by construction that unless the amendment proposed was the same proposition as the one under consideration that the amendment was not in order. That, reduced to an absurdity, means that unless the amendment is the same thing as that provided in the paragraph it is not in order.

Now, we never have had, with all our attempted restrictions, any such rule as that. We have fixed a rule in our code of rules that is a reasonable one, a rational one, and permits us to make amendments to paragraphs or bills under consideration that are germane to the "subject." Now, note the difference between "subject" and "proposition." The former relates to a general policy or purpose, while the latter relates to a single thing—a specific matter. The House rule permits us to go into the "subject." I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the last part of paragraph 7 of Rule XVI, and I read:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under the color of amendment.

The question is not, as claimed by the gentleman from Iowa, that this amendment is a different thing or a different proposition from the paragraph, and the question is whether it is on a different subject, not a different proposition. We have had an abundance of decisions to determine that, and some of them I should have doubt about whether they were even within that rule but for the long and uniform line of concurring parliamentary decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio state to the Chair what, in his opinion, is the difference between the present amendment and the one the gentleman proposed the other day, to strike out the word "fractional," on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made a ruling?

Mr. KEIFER. I offered no amendment at all the other day of a substantive kind, and now I have one.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what is the difference in effect between the gentleman's motion to strike out the word "fractional" the other day and his present amendment?

Mr. KEIFER. You ask a conundrum. I have never been able to get through my mind that an amendment that contained nothing (a mere motion to strike out one word) was a change of existing law, or was not germane to the paragraph. I never have been able to get that through my head at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield just there——

Mr. KEIFER. I made a motion to strike out a word in the paragraph the other day, and that was contended to be an amendment that changed existing law, when it did not do anything but take a word out of the paragraph. [Laughter.] It was held to be not germane because, after the word was out of the paragraph, it meant something else, not on account of what was in the amendment, but because what was left in the paragraph meant something else, and so, begging the Chairman's pardon, he must not put a conundrum to me.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. KEIFER. Presently; let me get through with this line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I call attention now to the Constitution, Manual, and Digest, page 323, and let me read a paragraph or two. This goes to the question the other day:

An amendment simply striking out words already in a bill may not be held not germane.

That was a decision in the Fifty-eighth Congress and again in the Fifty-ninth. But let us go further, and I read on the same page:

The germaneness of an amendment should be judged from the provisions of its text rather than from the purposes which circumstances may suggest.

Further:

The question is as to the germaneness of propositions which are related to the same general subject.

Now, first, what does germaneness mean? Not the same thing, not the same proposition, not the same thing in result or meaning, but germane means just what the word in its origin meant, namely, kinship, relation to, near akin. It arose long ago, when the German people were coming out of their tribal relations in Europe. The Celt and the Gaul, and the tribes that lived side by side in the then wilds of Germany and Gaul were at all times regarded as and called "German"—meaning kin or neighbors or tribes related. Hence the name German came to be applied to a great nation of people. We have cousins-german because they are related; they are akin, but they are not the same. Individually they are not the same, and propositions need not be the same to be germane to each other. So that germaneness means a different thing than the same proposition. Now, let us follow it just a little, if you will indulge me, Mr. Chairman.

On the same page:

A bill being considered under exceptional circumstances, an amendment germane to the bill—

Note, Mr. Chairman—

germane to the bill, but not strictly germane to the section, was admitted.

That is on page 323. And further:

An amendment germane to a bill as a whole, but hardly germane to any one section, may be offered at an appropriate place, with notice of motion to strike out following sections which it would supersede.

These are citations from our Constitution, Manual, and Digest, and they are abundant. Another one more directly appropriate on the point I have just discussed is:

A paragraph which changes existing law being allowed by general consent to remain, it may be perfected by any germane amendment.

All that is essential is for an amendment to be germane to the subject being legislated about. Reading further, on page 324:

A paragraph in an appropriation bill changing existing law may be perfected by a germane amendment which also changes existing law.

Now, the most that can be charged against my amendment is that it changes existing law while we are dealing with a paragraph which changes existing law. An amendment which also changes existing law is within the settled rules and precedents we are working under. To illustrate, reading further, from page 324:

To a bill relating to Federal elections and functions of the Federal court therein, an amendment establishing a system of jury commissioners in such court was held to be germane.

Why? Because the House was dealing with a subject, not merely with a definite proposition. In that instance a different proposition was offered by the amendment, but it was on the same subject, and it was rightfully held to be in order. Further:

To a bill referring generally to the affairs of a gas company, an amendment introducing the subject of the price of gas was held to be germane.

Further:

To a bill relating to the control of certain public places in Washington, an amendment providing for the removal of the fence around the Botanic Gardens was held to be germane.

That was a different proposition, but it was on the same subject, and the authorities seemed to be pretty well in line and in harmony.

Further:

To a bill providing generally for the improvement of rivers and harbors, an amendment providing for an additional harbor was held to be germane.

To a bill providing for an interoceanic canal, specifying a certain route, an amendment providing for another route was held to be germane.

It was not the same route. But here it is said that we can not do anything but talk about fractional silver coin. Here was another route, but it was on the same subject, and that far we are permitted to go under paragraph 7, of Rule XVI. But here is one a little closer, Mr. Chairman, on page 325:

To a proposition to recoin full legal-tender silver dollars into subsidiary coin, an amendment making the latter full legal tender was held to be germane.

Is that going into the matter of germaneness? Is not that going further into the matter of germaneness than we are asking to go now? We are dealing with what now? With the question of the transportation of silver, limited in the paragraph to fractional silver. The principal question is one of transportation of coin, but this is limited in the paragraph to the transportation of fractional coin. The subject on which we are proposing to legislate in the paragraph to which the amendment was offered relates broadly to the transportation of coin—silver coin. What we want is simply to extend it in the matter of transportation of coin to the transportation of fractional and other silver coin. Coin is the subject here, and my amendment comes easily within all of the precedents that I have been reading.

Mr. Chairman, I will not weary you much longer if you will just bear with me until I get another precedent or two in here:

To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory is germane.

That would look like getting another or different proposition into a bill, and would fall under the limitation of the rule contended for here that would destroy the practice of amendments of a substantive kind altogether. But the wisdom of the rule I maintain exists is upheld uniformly by the precedents I have just read. Again I read:

An amendment providing for an educational test for immigrants was held to be germane to a bill for the regulation of immigration of aliens into the United States.

That looked to me like going aside; but under a proper construction of the last part of paragraph 7 of Rule XVI, it was held to be within the "subject" of the immigration bill. That subject was under consideration, and being the "subject," not the "proposition," then it was in order. This being the rule and practice, my amendment is clearly within it and germane and consequently in order. It is clearly in order to submit an amendment such as I have offered. Again:

To a bill relating to the salaries of Federal judges and judges of the District of Columbia, an amendment relating to the salaries of the Porto Rican judges was held to be germane.

A different proposition, a different territory or province, yet we could deal with that as germane to a bill relating to the Federal judges of the District of Columbia.

To a bill relating to the salaries and expenses of judges, an amendment forbidding them to receive passes, franks, etc., was held to be germane.

Also:

To a bill establishing a new Department, creating officers and fixing the salaries, an amendment that changed the salaries of the officers of the Department was held to be germane.

A bill on a subject only to establish a new Department. Again:

To a bill providing generally for a Union Station in the District of Columbia, an amendment levying a special tax in the District to defray the cost of the station was held to be germane.

It was the same subject.

Further:

An amendment on the subject of renovated butter was held to be germane to a bill relating to "oleomargarine and other dairy products."

So another:

To a provision providing clerks to Senators, an amendment providing them also to Members of the House was held to be germane.

Well, we are not the same here in this House as they are in the Senate, but an amendment dealing with the "subject" of clerks for the two Houses was germane. An attempt to provide for clerks for the Senate brought up the "subject" of clerks for the House, and hence the amendment to provide clerks for this House was held germane and in order.

I have only gone into this subject thus fully because there seemed to be a strained opinion that the rule was so restricted in character that we could not do anything under it. Under the construction of the rule contended for here we could not do anything here on this paragraph that was not "fractional"—was not "fractional" in some way. This is too refined for a rule of this great parliamentary body. So that unless we are going now, in the precence of this great subject of transporting silver dollars free by the United States, to strike down a settled practice the point of order should be overruled. On March 24 last, because the appropriation for the purpose for this fiscal year was exhausted, the Secretary of the Treasury suspended the transportation of silver dollars at the expense of the Government. For the first time for many years the per capita circulation of this country has become reduced, and this partly at least by reason of the failure to make adequate appropriations for the free carriage of silver dollars. To avoid the continuance of this evil we should adopt this amendment, which I contend is germane. I am through for the present and will hear the other side.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to cite a few authorities to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee, although the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to cite to the Chair from Hinds's Digest of the Sixtieth Congress, page 325:

To a bill providing generally for the improvement of rivers and harbors an amendment providing for an additional harbor was held to be germane.

We were providing for harbors. Here we are providing for the transportation of coin—United States coin. Now, let us read it this way: "A bill providing for the transportation of silver coin or fractional coin," say; an amendment providing "for an additional coin" would be germane under this ruling, an "additional (kind of) coin," which is in this case a silver coin.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am reading from page 325 of Hinds's Digest, Sixtieth Congress, first session. I will send it up to the Chair in just a moment.

Now, there are similar cases, Mr. Chairman, in this book. I will not take up your time, but send it up to the Chair. I do want, however, now to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this:

A paragraph which changes existing law allowed to remain in the bill—

Which is this case—

may be perfected by any germane amendment.

The Chair at the time held otherwise, but the Chair was overruled, and the compiler of this volume so states; and there are a number of decisions which have followed that decision overruling the Chair cited in this volume.

A paragraph in an appropriation bill changing existing law—may be perfected by a germane amendment which also changes existing law.

That is this case—

Now, the proposed amendment is clearly germane, because, first, it refers to coins; second, it refers to silver coins, and, third, the paragraph which we all have consented to let remain in the bill, having been unobjected to, we have the right now to change that paragraph by germane amendment, although that germane amendment also changes existing law, which is exactly the proposition the gentleman has, I think, so well argued. Now, I will send these cases up to the Chair, so the Chair can look at them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the Chair ready to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will not insist on being heard if the Chair is ready to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this is in the nature of an application for a rehearing. This question was decided night before last by the then occupant of the Chair [Mr. DALZELL], and that decision was against the contention of the gentleman from Ohio.

We have in this country numerous kinds of money. The standard silver dollar may be said to be in a class by itself. The fractional silver is issued at a profit to the Government; is redeemable by the Government upon demand in proper quantities, and is a mere token and redeemable currency, which the standard silver dollar is not. The standard silver dollar is not redeemable by law and is as distinct from fractional silver as is the gold dollar.

Now, it ought to be conceded that there is no law authorizing the transportation of the standard silver dollar. The statement that it is found in the act of 1878 is scarcely worthy of consideration, in my judgment, although I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio is sincere in thinking it has been so construed. The silver dollar has been transported under appropriations made from time to time, the only authority being the appropriations.

Now, it is true that in the last Congress it was held that if Congress made an appropriation for a fiscal year, and that appropriation had existed during the fiscal year, the transportation having been authorized for that fiscal year, a deficiency appropriation was in order to carry out the law during the balance of that year. There is no case holding (except possibly the principle might apply of the railway-mail decision, which has been repudiated constantly in the House) that the mere fact that it is authorized for this year constitutes a basis for an appropriation for next year.

Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to one thing. He seemed to be astounded the other evening when it was held that a motion to strike out might be out of order. And yet, if the gentleman's theory is correct, if we had an appropriation in this bill for the improvement of the roads in the national cemeteries of the United States, some one could rise here and move to strike out the words "the national cemeteries of the" and thus, in effect, enact here upon an appropriation bill, without authority of law, the bill of our good friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW], or the bill of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER]. If the striking out is for the purpose of incorporating something, and it brings in an entirely new subject-matter, then it is out of order. There is no authority of law for the transportation of the standard silver dollar, and this appropriation brings in a wholly distinct subject-matter.

It is true that if we were legislating with reference to the expenses of the Botanic Garden, we could put in new expenses for the Botanic Garden, as stated by the gentleman; but because this bill provides for the transportation of one form of money, it is not possible within the rules of this House to bring in by amendment a provision for the transportation of different classes of money, and I submit the ruling of the Chair night before last ought to be adhered to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GARRETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand it has been held that this paragraph to which the amendment is offered by the gentleman from Ohio is itself out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was occupying the Chair at the time that paragraph was passed. No point of order was made to it, but it is very evident that the provision would have been subject to a point of order if one had been made at the time, because there is no law authorizing it.

Mr. GARRETT. Is it not the uniform holding that when a paragraph is subject to a point of order, and that point of order is not made, then an amendment which, as an independent proposition, might be subject to the point of order, is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is not; that is the question the Chair is about to decide.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] a few days ago, in a ruling upon the military bill, if I am not very much mistaken, held that proposition squarely. I may be in error about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no knowledge of that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the Chair rules, did the Chair distinctly hear me read these two lines?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is entirely familiar with that decision.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is another one.

A paragraph in an appropriation bill changing existing law may be perfected by a germane amendment which also changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give us the page in the Manual?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Page 324 of the Manual.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair allow me to say for the benefit of at least the gentleman from Iowa, who doubts the construction that I spoke of as being given to the act of 1878—I wish to call his attention to page 36 of the hearings on the urgent deficiency bill in the opening of the Fifty-ninth Congress. On that page he will find, dated September 3, 1878, a copy of a circular signed by John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, in which that construction was given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio is subject to a point of order. It does not appear that there is any authorization by law for the paragraph in the bill. The gentleman from Ohio made the statement that the act of 1878 had been construed by somebody as an authorization for that purpose. The Chair has carefully read the act of 1878, and in the opinion of the Chair no such authorization exists. None having been cited by the gentleman from Ohio, or any person in support of the proposition he makes, the Chair is of the opinion that the entire proposition under the head of "transportation of fractional silver coin," page 23, is contrary to law and would have been stricken out had the point of order been made. Therefore the only question that remains to be decided is as to whether or not the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, being germane to the paragraph, embodies an additional matter of unauthorized expenditure.

This whole subject was decided in a very well-considered decision rendered by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], sitting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in the Fifty-seventh Congress. The Chair will not read very much of the decision, but read the final summing up by the gentleman from Ohio, in which he took up and discussed the conflict that theretofore existed on the proposition of germaneness to a proposition which in and of itself was contrary to existing law.

The Chair finally said:

The Chair, though somewhat doubtful, thinks this the best rule: That if a paragraph has been included in the bill which has in it a taint of illegality or of being contrary to existing law, that paragraph can be corrected or perfected by an amendment; but if the further paragraph which is proposed as an amendment carries a further degree of illegality affecting the whole paragraph as amended, then it is not in order.

The Chair thinks that is the best rule. The Chair also has read the decision quoted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], that a paragraph which changes existing law, being allowed by general consent to remain, it may be perfected by any germane amendment; but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation; and that, the Chair thinks, is the better rule.

The Chair also read the other lines read by the gentleman:

A paragraph of an appropriation bill changing existing law may be perfected by a germane amendment which also changes existing law.

The Chair is of opinion that that is not the rule. It is an earlier decision, and has reference to another matter, into which the Chair has not gone. The Chair thinks it is a bad rule, and that the point of order should be sustained in accordance with the decision made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], which is certainly on all fours with the pending proposition, for it is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Ohio is practically the same in effect as the amendment he proposed the other day, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made a ruling similar to that now made by the Chair, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "applicants," line 11, page 23, the following: "Provided, That not less than one-half of this appropriation shall be used in transporting said coin by registered mail."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, when the Chair rules on this proposition, I really would like to have the Chair lay the rule down on this proposition. Is that a correct form of making a point of order just used by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], "I make the point of order?" I don't know what the gentleman's point of order is based upon. Let us see how it would work in a case where no quorum is present. Suppose I were to rise in my seat and say that "I make the point of order," and stopped there. Is it not plain how absurd it would be, when I had in my mind that there is "no quorum present" and wanted to make the point of order? I don't think that that is fair—certainly not fair—and not the proper way to make a point of order, to fail to state the reasons for the point of order. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for a moment. My proposition is clearly a limitation, and so intended.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, being somewhat inclined to favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, I shall withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order having been withdrawn, I would ask that the Clerk again report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER of Vermont having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20063) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. FOSTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6715. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war and other wars, and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of minor coin: For transportation of minor coin, $25,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, minor coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, somewhat akin to the one that was just offered and agreed to, which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 14, after the word "coin," insert the words "by registered mail or otherwise."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment, and for this reason, that this transportation is expressly authorized by existing law, and this changes the existing law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that point of order, or indulge me for a few moments, anyway.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I certainly am willing to reserve the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman certainly knows that the chairman of his committee [Mr. TAWNEY] and perhaps himself have been trying here for several years to reduce the enormous expense that falls upon the Government of hauling our moneys, bonds, and securities by express only.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement there?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. While the statement of the gentleman is entirely true, the committee has never recommended the transportation of nickels and pennies by registered mail, for the reason that it has never been deemed practicable.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know how much it costs per thousand to haul them?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Twenty-two dollars and seventy-seven cents per thousand to haul the minor coins and $2.40 to haul silver dollars and fractional coin. I have the official figures here.

Mr. TAWNEY. The entire appropriation is only $18,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Eighty-two thousand dollars in 1907, and always a deficit follows.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I have another amendment now, unless the gentleman will offer it himself. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the next Congress the necessary appliances and the cost thereof for doing this work on a larger scale. I do not want to go at this in a rush. I want to save the Government; I want to save the people. I am satisfied that the Department, if the heart of it were tested as well as brain, would quite agree with the spirit of this proposed legislation. Think of it. In 1888 we paid $1.88 per thousand to transport silver dollars. We then had transported about twenty-six millions, and now there are about thirty-eight millions to be hauled, and this same express monopoly is charging now $2.40, as Secretary Cortelyou says, and here are his own words, right here in this book, that I have written out on this slip of paper. We may just as well get down to common business sense. Here is the increased work of the express companies, the cost of the increase in the amount of money and bonds and securities that have to be sent all over the United States by express, because, I may say, that the contract which is now in existence prohibits the transmission of a bit of it by mail. I did not learn that until this morning. The law permits it to go by mail, but the contract says no; it all goes by express; and here we are paying $22.77 a thousand for carrying copper coin and nickels and minor coin and $2.40 for the silver dollars. Yet we paid $1.89 for carrying silver dollars in 1888, when 55,545,303 silver dollars were hauled—when we were then carrying 55,545,303 silver dollars, or about that number—and now we are carrying about $78,000,000. I do submit, Mr. Chairman, that either the great legislative committee of this House should report a bill here regulating this matter or this committee itself should report a proposition that covers this crying evil.

Now, these are facts that I challenge any man in the House to dispute successfully. I repeat, we paid $2,40 a thousand last year for carrying silver dollars when we carried about $78,000,000, and $1.88 per thousand when we carried in 1888 $22,000,000 less. We are now paying, I repeat for the purpose of accentuation, $22.77 for carrying the little old nickels and coppers around over the country for the benefit of the newspapers, the street car companies, and the people, and yet there has not been one bit of legislation on this subject to reduce and refix this rate, or the $2.40 rate we also pay to have fractional coin. Congress has done nothing—and when I say Congress, gentlemen, I mean Democrats and Republicans alike—has enacted no legislation as far back as I can find it—to cure this evil, but I now appeal to your sense of justice and as business men to now start. Why in the world do you direct in each of these paragraphs—

> And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under the appropriation?

That is in the item for transportation of fractional silver coin, and then in the next, for transportation of minor coin, we find this:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Why are you putting that in there? You certainly have a good reason for this direction and the Department has complied. Why does not Congress, why does not the Judiciary Committee, why does not this great Committee on Appropriations—and I say it absolutely dispassionately, without the slightest impulse of partisanship—report legislation here to cure this crying evil? Now, that is what I am trying to do. I have tried to get, Mr. Chairman, all the facts through the great Ways and Means Committee, but they have not reported my resolution on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask for just five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Last year we transported $3,619,117 of minor coin, and it cost $82,000 to do it, or $22.77, as I have said, per thousand. Now, the gentleman can at least put a provision—and I ask the gentleman to do it; I have a proposed amendment for it somewhere—to this effect:

> That by the next session of Congress the necessary facilities and the cost thereof for transporting said coin by registered mail and by registered mail insured shall be reported to the House for our information.

Now, I want to submit that Mr. Joseph T. Howell, either the president or vice-president—at all events, he is the chief active officer—of the Fourth National Bank at Nashville, Tenn., a United States depository, wrote to me, and I have his language here, stating there were companies throughout the United States that insured coins, moneys, and so forth, when sent through the mails, and at a small insurance rate. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that individuals, at least, send bonds, securities, and other valuable articles to the Treasury, and they are sent back through the registered mail. Why not the United States? The banks of Nashville, Tenn., I want to say, as you all will admit a great commercial city, great in almost everything she undertakes, the bankers there all tell me they send their money throughout that country, with perfect safety, in the registered mail at a small rate for insurance. Now, why can not the great committee reporting this bill take up some line of reform in that way, and especially so, I submit in all candor, when you not only appropriate money to carry this minor coin at $22.70 per thousand, but you bring in a deficit here regularly for hauling these and other moneys, and have done it every year since I have been in Congress, because of these oppressive express charges. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that at least the committee can, with perfect propriety, permit this amendment, and I ask the gentleman to agree to it. Insert, after the word "appropriation," line 21, page 23, the following:

> And report at the next session of Congress the necessary facilities and the cost thereof for transporting said coin by registered mail and registered mail insured.

Mr. YOUNG. Is that a new amendment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes. I will ask the gentleman to offer it or I will offer it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman has already one amendment pending. Are you going to offer another one on top of that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, no. I want you to know about this now. Let us pass on the pending amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to insist upon the point of order against this amendment, but I would like to make a brief statement here. The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 3529, provide:

> The minor coins authorized by this title may, at the discretion of the Director of the Mint, be delivered in any of the principal cities and towns of the United States, at the cost of the mint, for transportation.

It is true that the committee has acquiesced in the amendment with reference to the silver. The appropriation is larger for that than for this. There is a law authorizing the transportation of minor coin and not of silver coin.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman state there is such a law?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Authorizing the transportation of minor coin?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I just read it to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly read it again? The Chair did not catch all of it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It reads:

> The minor coins authorized by this title may, at the discretion of the Director of the Mint, be delivered in any of the principal cities and towns of the United States, at the cost of the mint, for transportation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It does not say what kind of transportation, does it?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would not that permit transportation by mail?

The CHAIRMAN. Does it mean in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I take it so. As a matter of fact, this question of how these coins shall be transported is one that has interested the Committee on Appropriations for some years. We think we are paying too much to the express companies for handling these coins, and we have been desirous of experimenting and transporting them by registered mail, but it must not be forgotten that while it may be economical for the citizen to transport by registered mail, it may be very expensive for the Government to transport by registered mail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why so?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Because the citizen is getting the postal service at less than it costs the Government, and consequently it will cost more to transport in the mail than it would cost the citizen.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you tell us what in the world would make it cost the Government more to send to New York and back and forward?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say it will cost more than it will cost the citizen to ship it that way, because the postal service is conducted at a loss, and the citizen does not pay for that service what we must pay for it if we ship by registered mail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If we send it both by mail and express we get a competitive rate, do we not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We have assented to this system of registry, and as this has been going on for many years, he ought to be satisfied without changing existing law on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa state to the Chair now that this changes in any way, by limitation or otherwise, the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As I understand, it would deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the discretion given him by the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] says:

> Transportation of minor coin by registered mail or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; that is not the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment that is now being considered.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It provides that half of it is to be transported by one method and half of it by the other.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only amendment the Chair has—by registered mail or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If it does not include this last suggestion, I do not know that we will specially object—that it may be by registered mail or otherwise. It is merely a formal amendment, and it may be put in as far as we are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] that this is the only amendment that is now pending.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You will accept that amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It does not change the law in the slightest degree or affect the meaning in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, and I will read it. Insert, in line 21, page 23, following the word "appropriation" and beginning with the word "and."

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, on page 23, line 21, after the word "appropriation," "and report at the next session of Congress the necessary facilities and cost thereof for transporting such coin by registered mail and by registered mail insured."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a word on the merits.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman claim that this requires him to ship by registered mail during the next fiscal year?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is discretionary. That simply asks the Secretary of the Treasury to report to us what facility he needs and the cost of it. I am told that is all that is needed. It does not change any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which has been placed in the hands of the Clerk, to insert, after the paragraph just concluded, as a new paragraph.

Insert as a new paragraph, after line 21, the following:
"Transportation of silver coin: For transportation of silver dollars by registered mail or otherwise, $50,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I make the point of order against this amendment. It is not authorized by existing law, and it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Independent Treasury: For contingent expenses under the requirements of section 3653 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, and for transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $260,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, after line 3, insert:
"For defraying expenses of transporting money stored at the San Francisco mint and receiving and storing the same elsewhere, $300,000."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the transportation of coin between the mints of the United States is authorized by law. There is statutory authority for it, and this is simply transporting some of the coin in one mint to another mint.

Mr. GARRETT. I am satisfied it is subject to the point of order, but I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. I will ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that the Secretary of the Treasury recommends this appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. He does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Before that question is put, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Are all these moneys and bonds transported by express?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman know what the rates are?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I do not recall what the rate is. This is a provision for the transportation between subtreasuries and the mints. I do not know what the rates are. I think it is the same as the other rate—a dollar a thousand. If the gentleman will turn to the hearings, he will find it in the statement made by the officer in charge of this part of the work of the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recoinage of gold coins: For recoinage of light-weight gold coins in the Treasury, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, as required by section 3512 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, $7,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is perhaps as good a place as any in this bill to invite attention to the very remarkable figures that we find in the Treasury statement for the last three days, and also to the fact—and I do this on the very highest authority, that of a distinguished member of that body—that another branch of Congress has been expending the money of the people at the rate of $163,000,000 in four minutes; at least, the newspapers say it was done in four minutes, but the gentleman from whom I had this said that it was done in appreciably less than five minutes.

My attention, Mr. Chairman, was drawn to the remarkable figures that appear in the Treasury statement of April 28. On that date the excess of expenditures over receipts was $985,000. The cash balance at the same time was $250,448,728.

By a little calculation it is manifest that if that rate of expenditure over receipts continued for 254 days, we would be scraping the bottom of the money chest. However, the figures of April 29, the next day, were slightly more encouraging. On that day the expenditures of the Government were only the trifling sum of $707,247 in excess of the receipts, and the deficiency for the fiscal year was only $49,514,122.

But, Mr. Chairman, while my hope was uplifted on that day by the better financial statement, I was cast into the slough of despond by the statement that came this morning. I found that yesterday the expenses of the Government were $2,131,707 more than the receipts, and while the available cash balance in the Treasury still amounted to $250,448,728, the deficiency for the fiscal year was $51,645,829.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state also what the deficiency was for the month of April, or the difference between the expenditures and receipts for the month of April? I think it was over $11,000,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For that month it was $15,970,000. Mr. Chairman, these figures may not appeal to gentlemen generally, but it is really a startling situation when we find that this enormous cash balance will soon be completely exhausted; if the rate of expenditure that obtained yesterday were to continue it would completely exhaust it in three months and twenty-three days. If the rate of day before yesterday continued, the cash balance would not be exhausted for eleven months and twenty-three days. If the rate of the day before continued, it would be all gone in eight months and fourteen days.

I am not sufficiently advised as to what are the prospects of the revenue of the Government to say how long this deficiency will continue, nor how soon we may expect to see the bottom of this money chest that has been overflowing for so many years. I said to a Member of this House a few moments ago that I was going to invite attention to these figures, and he suggested that in common fairness I ought to assert that there were members of my own party who advocated the enormous expenditures made by this Congress, that I ought not to be guilty of unfairness or cast on the majority the entire responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I accept frankly, fully, and cheerfully his suggestion. I know that this side of the House, as well as that, has advocated extravagant expenditures on the part of the Government which I do not believe the income of the Government warrants nor the necessities require. I said to him, in response to his suggestion, that I would be glad to see the expenses of the Government reduced—the military expenses, the naval expenses, the expenditure of money in many other directions—but I regretted specially to see such enormous extravagances, such a frightful outlay going on when we present to the world the spectacle of a body spending more than a thousand million dollars, throwing scores of millions into the sea, as it were, building battle ships which, in my judgment, are not required to fight an enemy who does not exist, who could not reach us if we had such an enemy, while we refuse to make an appropriation of $60,000 to take care of and properly house a donation of works of art given by a patriotic woman.

We squander scores of millions for the purpose of butchery and decline to give a few paltry thousands for the cultivation of the refining and gentling influences of the arts. Mr. Chairman, it is preposterous, it can not be supported, it can not be justified by any process of reasoning whatever.

But we need not curtail a single penny in the appropriations for public buildings that are required, we need not curtail a single penny in making appropriations required for the development of waterways, and we may go on making all the appropriations that we can possibly expend in a judicious way for development along productive lines like the improvement of waterways. We can do all that and still save hundreds of millions.

It is impossible to trace it, so cleverly is it covered up, in the general appropriations, but I hold the opinion that if we could analyze all of the projects that are in this bill, if we could follow the expenditure of every dollar that goes out of the Public Treasury, we would find that not less than $75,000,000, possibly $150,000,000, a year is squandered in the prosecution of colonial enterprises 7,000 miles beyond our Pacific coast.

And I am of the opinion that if we would but divorce ourselves from political and geographical contact with the Asiatic races and come back to the American continent and mind our own business, as George Washington and other statesmen of the older days advised, we would not only operate our Government for hundreds of millions of dollars less, but that our people would be immeasurably happier and wealthier. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Distinctive paper for United States securities: For distinctive paper for United States securities, including expenses of transportation, salaries of register, assistant register, four counters, five watchmen, one skilled laborer, and expenses of officer detailed from the Treasury as superintendent, $310,000.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I move to strike out the last word. Here is a provision for distinctive paper for United States securities, $310,000. In a paragraph a little further along there is a provision for distinctive paper for currency. I should like to know what these securities are which require so much money for distinctive paper.

Mr. TAWNEY. One item is for national-bank notes and the other for United States Treasury notes, silver certificates, and gold certificates; and then there is distinctive paper for internal-revenue stamps, but that is not included in this paragraph.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Why are not this paragraph and the one at the top of the next page put together? What is the difference?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. One is for national-bank notes and the other for national currency.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Which is which?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The smaller item is for national-bank notes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The national banks repay that themselves, and that is the reason why the two items are separate.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does this include the amount of paper that is going to be used for the purpose of issuing the $750,000,000 to be provided for the increase under the Vreeland bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; that will have to be in a supplemental appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Special witness of destruction of United States securities: For pay of the representative of the public on the committee to witness the destruction by maceration of Government securities, at $5 per day while actually employed, $1,565.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. In these days when we are running so much behind this seems a very foolish and unnecessary expenditure, unless some explanation can be given of it. Nor do I know of any provision of law which authorizes that expenditure. I refer to the $1,500 a year paid to some person who, in behalf of the public, witnesses the destruction of the Government notes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law expressly authorizes that service.

Mr. PERKINS. Does it direct it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it does. There is a committee appointed to witness the destruction of these securities.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the necessity for this representative of the public?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is for the purpose of making sure that the securities are destroyed.

Mr. PERKINS. Why should $1,500 a year be paid to one person?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not all paid to one person. There is a committee, and they meet several times a year.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but it amounts to paying $1,500 for what must be a pure sinecure, and a wholly unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; I am in search of information, because this seems like a pure waste.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does not my colleague recall the trouble which our recent comptroller, Mr. Wilson, had in the State of New York from the fact that they did not have such a representative of the public, and he was accused of the careless misuse of stamps to the amount of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000, because there was no committee to supervise their destruction?

Mr. PERKINS. Of course there must be some one to supervise the destruction, but I understand there are certain Government employees, several of them, charged with the work and the responsibility. Now, to have some one outside come in at $1,500 a year to supervise this work is as unnecessary, it seems to me, as to have a representative of the public in any other work done by the employees of the Government.

Mr. BENNET of New York. We had in our State employees of the State government whose duty it was to see that this was done, and they did it, and, as a matter of fact, the stamps were destroyed, but the fact that there was no organized committee with an outside representative to witness the destruction led to the trouble which occurred.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not see why there is greater confidence if some man is picked up from the outside. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] say that there is any statute under which this appropriation is authorized?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I do.

Mr. PERKINS. Because, if there is not any, I am going to make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. The statute authorizes it. I will read from the hearings of two years ago, on page 197, where Secretary Shaw was interrogated in regard to the matter. He said:

We destroy those that are redeemed, and it takes a certain amount of help, and we employ those people and pay them.

Mr. SMITH. A person outside of the Department is employed for this purpose?

Mr. SHAW. Yes; a person from the outside and two people from the inside.

Mr. SMITH. So you have a pretty good check on it.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Noble, the special witness for the United States securities, is a gentleman appointed by the Secretary to represent the people, and the others are representatives from the Registrar's office and from the Treasurer's office.

Mr. PERKINS. Then the representative of the people is somebody that the Secretary of the Treasury picks out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; if it is authorized by law.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Following up what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] has said, I desire to state that this paragraph seems to provide $5 a day for every day in each year, except Sundays, to pay some particular person to witness the fact of the destruction of the Government securities provided for in this provision. It strikes me that a man who could be picked up for $5 a day to be used as a witness on a great proposition of this kind would not be a very important character. I can not see, to save my life, how the law contemplates that the Government will be very greatly protected by employing a person at the small sum of $5 a day to witness the destruction of securities that are ready for cancellation.

If it could go out on a point of order, it looks to me like it would be a clear saving of $1,565 a year, whereas it is now practically macerated when it is paid to a witness, just as much as the securities that he is called upon to witness the maceration of.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why does not the gentleman move to strike out the paragraph and take the sense of the committee on the proposition?

Mr. MACON. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer a formal one to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, beginning with line 15, strike out the paragraph down to and including line 20.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman know who the people are that destroy this money?

Mr. MACON. I do not. I think they ought to be highly responsible, however.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Very well, I will tell the gentleman. The macerater in the Treasury Department has three locks upon it. One of those can only be opened by the Comptroller of the Currency or some man from his office, one by the Secretary of the Treasury, and one by the Treasurer of the United States. Those three men must always be present, or somebody from their office representing them, before the machine can be opened and this money put in for destruction. Now, you have got a man at $5 a day to watch the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. MACON. Which emphasizes the needlessness of this particular witness. We know that a $5 a day man can not add anything to an occasion of this sort that would be in any sense valuable to the American people; and while it will save only $1,565 per annum, it will be that much saved, and I believe this committee ought to save even that small sum whenever it has an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how much is destroyed in value of securities each year.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is impossible for me to state the amount that is destroyed. The destruction is going on almost every day. They have in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving a macerater, and that is where the money, including the national-bank notes, the gold notes, and the silver certificates, and all the money that is redeemed by the Government, is destroyed, and the destruction by statute must be made in the presence of some one who represents the people, as the statute expresses it, and somebody to represent the Department.

Mr. McCALL. Is not it a very great amount—many millions of dollars a year?

Mr. TAWNEY. It amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

Mr. McCALL. It seems to me this would effect so infinitesimal a saving, Mr. Chairman, and at a risk very great——

Mr. TAWNEY. And the statute requires this service. It was deemed in the judgment of Congress of sufficient importance to guard the destruction of this money to have some one who was not a regular official of the Treasury Department to witness that destruction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman answer a question? Does the gentleman believe, as a practical proposition, that the public witness, as he terms it, is any additional safeguard at all? Is not that duty performed chiefly in a perfunctory way? He is not a classified man, and is it intended to go out of the classified service to get a spoilsman to watch classified clerks and officers?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will have to address his question to the Members of Congress who were here and enacted this law. I do not know what influence prompted Congress to provide this additional safeguard in the destruction of these hundreds of millions of dollars of paper money——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But we do not have to make the appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Nevertheless the statute requires it, and the statutory recommendation for that service exists.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why is it necessary to have these notes canceled every day, so this $5 a day man, who can only be there a few minutes during the operation——

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because the redemption of notes is going on every day.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why should it be necessary——

Mr. TAWNEY. And there is not vault room enough to store the notes that have been once redeemed and canceled, and it is for the purpose of getting them out of the way.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They do not have to cancel them every day.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. TAWNEY. Go ahead.

Mr. MACON. I want to ask the chairman of the committee the direct question. Do you believe, sir, as chairman of the committee that has had this matter under consideration for year after year, that this $5 a day man saves to the Government one single cent in the course of a year in the matter of watching persons who are charged with the duty of destroying this paper? Do you think it saves one single cent in the course of a year?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that it is not for the purpose of saving the Government money in the sense he uses that term; it is for the purpose of satisfying everybody that the destruction of redeemed paper is accomplished honestly. The statute requires that when a note is redeemed and canceled it must be destroyed. Now, that destruction should take place in accordance with the law in the presence of three persons, one of whom is a public witness or who represents the people as contradistinguished from the Department. Now, to clear the matter up I will read section 3180 of the Revised Statutes:

> Whenever any United States notes returned to the Treasury are so mutilated or otherwise injured as to be unfit for use, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to replace the same with others of the same character and amount.

Section 3181 reads:

> Mutilated United States notes, when replaced according to law, and all other notes which by law are required to be taken up, and not reissued, when taken up, shall be destroyed in such manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The only regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury is the appointment of a man who represents the public as contradistinguished from the Department. I am informed now—I do not know whether the information is correct or not—but I am informed that the present public witness, if you please to call him that, is the former director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, General Meredith. I think I was asked that question a moment ago. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if that is the only employment Mr. Meredith has?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the only employment he has, that is, so far as the Government service is concerned.

Mr. MACON. So far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit me, I desire to say I happened to be at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing when this process was going on, and I happen to know that this gentleman is there and superintends this personally, so that he gives personal attention to his duties.

Mr. KEIFER and Mr. MACON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. I will be very brief. I think the statement is not clearly made as to the duties of this witness for the Government. He is not a mere witness of the maceration or destruction of securities. He knows and is required to know what is being destroyed. Having witnessed that faithfully, as we must assume, he is required to make a statement in relation to them, as to kind, amount, and so forth. My recollection is that this applies not only to the class of Government securities mentioned here in this paragraph, but to all mutilated and worn-out national bank and other notes circulating as money. The same sort of destruction goes on of all canceled and worn-out notes of the different denominations of the different banks, and there is a record made and a certificate made and filed. I think the witness has to make an affidavit to his report or statement, and it is filed, and if any question comes up it can be settled by going to these papers. The record thus made contains the history of the destruction of all classes of Government securities. It is a most important place, and it is not absolutely an office. This distinguished gentleman who is generally there may not be there every day, but some other distinguished gentleman will be there. It is not a classified office at all. I am not sure but a Member of the House of Representatives might go there, if he would take the time, and examine the securities that were to be destroyed, keep a list of them, see that the destruction took place, and after the destruction make his proper certificate and the record that is to be kept. And it is a very important service to the Government when we extend it to the destruction of worn-out or mutilated national-bank paper. It is a very important one for the banks; and $5 a day is a very small sum to be paid per diem. You see that there are three hundred and twelve days in the year provided for—that is, $5 a day for three hundred and twelve days in the year, and that is on the theory that——

Mr. DRISCOLL. He gets pay for three hundred and thirteen days here.

Mr. KEIFER. If that be so, if the work goes on, it is still only $5 a day. That ought not to break the Government up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee must remember that from the time this distinctive paper that is used for Government securities and bank notes has begun to be manufactured the Government throws the greatest safeguards about it. It is of the utmost importance, as has often been demonstrated, that every scrap of this paper be accounted for from the time it is manufactured until it is so destroyed that it can not be used for any other purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. If my colleague will permit, I will suggest right there that the Government superintends not only the manufacture, but from the manufacture of the paper until it is finally destroyed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I recall correctly, in the Treasury Department they count fifty-two times the sheets of paper that are finally stamped and turned out as paper money. Now, it may be that at this particular time these mutilated notes would be as effectively destroyed without this witness as if he were there; but as the result of long experience, and in the belief that it was a wise thing to do, it was determined to be beneficial not only to have the Government officials, but somebody not connected with any Government department, present when this paper was destroyed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the Government authorize the selection of a witness to represent the public in the manufacture of the paper or any other stage of its handling except this maceration? There are no witnesses to represent the public in any stage of the manufacture of this distinctive paper, are there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not that I know; but I have no doubt that this particular person, or witness, for this purpose was designated and is employed because of some peculiar conditions that existed at that time and that may now be removed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I supposed the Secretary of the Treasury and all the men engaged up there and receiving salaries from the Public Treasury are representing the public and looking after the public's interests.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is undoubtedly true, but it was deemed wise to have somebody not connected with the different services under the Treasury Department or the affiliated bureaus of the Government present when this was done.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will try to answer it.

Mr. PERKINS. Undoubtedly you can. What degree of additional safety does the gentleman think we get when, instead of some employee of the Government in an important position, the Secretary of the Treasury himself picks out somebody who is to draw this pay and come in and supervise this work? Wherein does it especially guard the public against any loss to have the Secretary of the Treasury pick out his own man to superintend the destruction of these bills?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I am unable to answer that question. Perhaps my colleague will try and answer one for me.

Mr. PERKINS. All right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is he able to give the reason which resulted originally in the witness being selected outside of Government employment?

Mr. PERKINS. I am not able to give any reason, other than it appears to me a purely foolish position, a position created to draw an extra salary for very little work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you know anybody who has applied for this position and did not get it?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know that I ever heard of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have heard at some time the reason for this appointment outside of the officials. The details do not now come to me, but I know it was because of a condition that existed at one time. If I am not mistaken, some of these securities were not destroyed. It is an additional precaution that was taken. It may not be wise, but I would sooner spend the $1,500 to make certain the destruction rather than vote not to appropriate it without having the reason that impelled the selection of a witness of this character and know just why such a witness has been used.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it destroyed before it is sent over to the Bureau?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that is a different class of paper. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me as being absolutely useless to require the payment of $5 a day to some one to watch other officers of the Department discharge a certain duty. Why, sir, in the expenditure of all the money of this country some one must be trusted to do it, but we do not employ witnesses at $5 a day to see that the money of the country is properly expended. The parties who are charged with the duty of macerating Government securities ought certainly to be as responsible as any $5 a day men that can possibly be found in the city of Washington, and why they should have a witness that can be secured for the per diem just mentioned to watch them discharge their duty surpasses my capacity to reason out or understand. I insist that it is a reflection upon the integrity and honesty of one who occupies the high position of Secretary of the Treasury for it to be deemed necessary to employ some one at $5 a day to witness that he properly discharges that particular part of his duty as Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman must bear in mind that the Secretary has power to appoint the man whom he desires to watch him.

Mr. MACON. That is a good point, sir. If the Secretary of the Treasury was disposed to do wrong, he being given power to select some one to witness the maceration of these securities, would certainly get some one who would witness the transaction just as he would want it witnessed.

Why, sir, it is true that this, in a way, is a small matter, but small matters when added together make large matters sometimes, and when we find small matters in connection with any part of the administration of the affairs of this Government that are being conducted in a wrongful manner, it becomes our duty to right the wrong as well as we can.

The gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, insists that this appropriation ought to be made, because the law has provided for it heretofore. Why, we are charged with the duty of correcting the wrongful features of the law in so far as we can whenever we find that they exist. Therefore I insist now——

Mr. TAWNEY. While the gentleman is discussing this amendment seriously, will he permit me to inform him that while I submit it is necessary to do this because the law requires it, I also claim that it is necessary to do it because, if the appropriation is not made we do not change the law, but simply permit the service to continue, and allow a claim to run against the Government for which we will have to appropriate later. If the gentleman wants to accomplish his purpose, he ought to introduce a bill changing the law. He can not change the law by refusing the appropriation; and that is all he proposes to do.

Mr. MACON. No one knows better than the chairman of the committee that that statement will hardly hold water. Because the Secretary of the Treasury, if this appropriation was stricken out and the matter left to his discretion, would not go to the trouble of employing this witness when no appropriation had been made to pay for his services.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman does not change the discretion now vested in the Secretary by the law by refusing to make the appropriation. He still has the discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of assistant custodians and janitors: For pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services for the care of all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia, and washing towels, sprinkling streets, and removing rubbish in connection with said buildings, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, $1,688,872; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall so apportion this sum as to prevent a deficiency therein.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if this additional appropriation over the appropriation for 1908, amounting to about $118,000, provides for an increase in the pay of janitors and others employed in the various public buildings throughout the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. The pay of assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings is fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury and paid out of this lump-sum appropriation. The estimate was increased, as the representative of the Treasury Department informed the committee, for the purpose of giving some increases of salaries to these assistant custodians, janitors, laborers, and charwomen, and the committee recommend the allowance of the full amount of the estimate. I therefore infer that with the appropriation equal to their estimate they will carry out the purpose which they declared they had when they were before the committee. There is some of this increase which is made necessary on account of new buildings that are coming into commission during the next fiscal year.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I understand from the Treasury Department that they asked for a sufficient amount to allow this increase.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what they informed the committee.

Mr. KNOWLAND. You gave them all they asked?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think it is entirely proper. A great many of them are receiving only $45 a month, and that is a very low wage. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new paragraph to come in at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, after line 6:
"For payment of transportation by mail of all mutilated and insanitary United States notes sent to the United States Treasury for reissuance."

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order on that, and I will say further that we have passed the item which the gentleman refers to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I make it. We have heard from the gentleman this morning on his proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have not addressed myself to this question, nor has anyone else, I am sorry to say, in the Congress of the United States. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point for a couple of minutes. Does the gentleman know what my amendment is about?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What?

Mr. TAWNEY. About the transportation of silver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; it is not. I knew the gentleman did not understand it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I knew it was either silver or else dirty money; I did not know which. The gentleman has frequently addressed the House on those two propositions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am talking about this dirty paper money which spreads disease all over the United States, and the Government of the United States is as much responsible for its condition as are the people through whose hands it circulates. It goes into every corner of the civilized world, and is worn out and befouled, and then it brings back all kinds of disease and filth. A similar item was carried for a number of years in the appropriation bills, and I have sought for several years to get some legislation on this subject. I knew the gentleman did not know what my amendment was about, and I want to tell him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking by unanimous consent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I presume I am, because the House seems anxious to hear something about dirty money. I do not know of any man who uses as little dirty money as does the gentleman from Minnesota. He gets it clean, right out of the Treasury, and the kind of money that he uses, in the clean condition in which he receives it, would be a curiosity to the people out West.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Minnesota is glad to get any kind of money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, this is more or less serious. If we have a Democratic House, I am going to have a clean-money bill or I am going to be very much disappointed. I know, Mr. Chairman, if the public press can ever tell a straight story on the subject, and of course it does, that an Army officer in Manila city recently lost his life counting the dirty money of the United States Government in paying off the Federal obligations. Several in New York City have lost their hands for the same reason, the cashier of the Hoffman House, New York, being one of them. That is the Democratic headquarters, and I have no doubt that if we could find the Republican headquarters we would find that somebody had lost his life by the same means. [Laughter.]

But, gentlemen, you would be greatly astonished if you read the mail that I have received since I started this crusade against disease-breeding money. This is nothing new except the idea that I have employed in the bill which the Committee on Banking and Currency have had in custodia legis. Of course they are too busy fooling around with the currency bill, the Hill bill, the Vreeland bill, the Aldrich bill, and other bills, to give attention to this plain, serious proposition.

Now, for a number of years we appropriated $55,000 a year to purge the country of rotten money. They continued it until the currency was clean, and then they dropped it. Why can not you do it now? Why, if you go back into the sections of the country removed from Washington, where we get clean money, you will find it so foul that it stinks in the nostrils of the miser! Our wives, our nurses, our children, our good Samaritans deal with it, and then they have to handle the little infants, and if they have some little sore upon the mouth or upon the eye their blessed little bodies become inoculated with a disease carried on the hands of these ministering angels. The gentleman from Minnesota says he does not have any dirty money. Neither does any other Member of Congress, but if you go back into the country where I have been you will find it. The gentleman from Minnesota is busy in Washington, but I go back to where the lamp of liberty started, in the country, and there I find the best people in the world; but what do they have? Dirty money that they sweat their faces to make, and yet it stinks so that they complain to the sanitary officers and to the people, and appeal to me, as I appeal to you and to Congress, to give them a remedy. What is $55,000 to this great Government compared with having clean money? The people will indorse it if we only do the clean thing by them, and then we will all have clean money and clean consciences and conscious that our full duty has been well done. [Applause.] I hope I have converted the gentleman from Minnesota and that he will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

General inspector of supplies for public buildings: For one general inspector, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to inspect public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department and report on the efficiency of the custodians' forces and the use of fuel, lights, water, miscellaneous supplies, etc., $3,000; and for actual necessary traveling expenses, not exceeding $2,000; in all, $5,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, on the ground that that is new legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that there is no law or statute authorizing this position. The provision has been carried in the sundry civil bill for a number of years. The Committee on Appropriations at the last Congress, at both sessions, reported a bill omitting this paragraph, but it was always inserted in the Senate and insisted upon, and the House has always receded from its disagreement to the amendment. The committee at this session concluded, in view of our failure in the past to carry it, to recommend it to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inspector of furniture and other furnishings for public buildings: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ a suitable person to inspect all public buildings and examine into their requirements for furniture and other furnishings, $2,500; and for actual necessary traveling expenses, including actual traveling expenses of assistant, not exceeding $3,000; in all, $5,500.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that provision.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the point of order?

Mr. MACON. That the position is not provided for by existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that that is a fact; both of these provisions were omitted in the bill as reported at both sessions of the last Congress for the reason I have stated. The inspection has been going on for several years.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any authorization of law for it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; no law authorizing it. It is a public work that has been going on for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Arkansas make the point of order

Mr. MACON. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assistant inspector of furniture and other furnishings for public buildings, $1,600.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that provision; the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order on lines 1 and 2, page 27?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether or not there is authorization for this.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no statutory authorization for this provision. This provision has been carried in the sundry civil bill for a number of years, and will be next year. The House will recede again as it always has on all of these provisions, and we will be put to the trouble and expense of doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this position a clerk in the classified service?

Mr. TAWNEY. This position is in the classified service. The first is the inspector and this is the assistant inspector, and they are both in the classified service. The one on the other page is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The assistant inspector is in the classified service within the meaning of the statute which creates the classified service?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not in that sense. He is required to take a civil-service examination, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is subject to the point of order and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The furniture for all new public buildings shall hereafter be procured in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, for fear someone will try to get a witness to watch this gentleman at $5 a day while he is preparing these plans and specifications, I make the point of order against that provision.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Of course it is possible that it is subject to a point of order, but I think the gentleman will withdraw his point of order if he knows the circumstances.

Mr. MACON. I am afraid that they will bring in a witness at $5 a day to watch him while he is making the plans.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The point is this: The architect draws the plans of a building, and, of course, necessarily of the rooms in that building. He knows what furniture is adapted to those rooms. Of course if the gentleman is desirous of having the plans or designs for the furniture supplied by some one who did not draw the plans, and have furniture that would not be suitable, he has a right to have that. Still, the object of this is to let the Supervising Architect not draw the plans for the furniture, but overlook the designs—that they shall be submitted to him, so that he may know whether the furniture is harmonious with the building which he has planned. It does not cost anything at all. Of course if the gentleman wishes to insist on his point or order, it is well taken.

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order for the purpose of getting a little information. It seems to me that, with the great number of buildings scattered all over the United States in different climates and with different requirements, to concentrate it all in Washington and say that the guardians of these buildings can not as much as buy a set of chairs without their first being approved is somewhat cumbersome.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not what this does.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to know what it does.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This refers only to new public buildings—when a new building is erected and furniture installed. Now, that furniture ought to be suitable furniture for that type of building. The custodian of a building now has nothing to do with the selection of it. It is selected by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department. The question is whether the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, in furnishing a new building, ought to submit his plans for furniture to the supervising architect who drew the plans of the building that he may see whether the furniture is fitted for the building.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask my friend a question. We have to consider the effect of such regulations as these. Architects are human. They have their ideas of what should be. Does the gentleman not think that making it necessary to have all the furniture approved by the architect to correspond with his architectural plan will result in very costly systems of furniture being installed, more so, really, than we require for our everyday life in custom-houses and collectors' rooms and court-houses and witnesses' rooms? These public buildings are not parlors where the members of the Cabinet are to receive foreign representatives, but are everyday workaday rooms.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is true; but there is no proposition to expend any additional money; there is no proposition here to have the architect plan the furniture, which I think he should, but the proposition is that before the furniture is ordered for a particular building designs of it should be submitted to the man who drew the designs of that building, that he may see whether the designs of the furniture are fit for the building.

Mr. PERKINS. The idea being if this is a Louis XV room, that we will have a suite of Louis XV furniture.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is better informed on such subjects than I am, and I can not give him any information on that.

Mr. PERKINS. That would seem to be the result, which would be an exceedingly costly system to inaugurate for our court-houses and post-offices.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit, do you think that the chief clerk of the Treasury Department is more competent to determine the character of the furniture that should go into Government buildings than the Supervising Architect, the man who designed the buildings and under whose supervision they are constructed?

Mr. PERKINS. From the little experience, I should fear the result would be that the furniture that was approved by the Supervising Architect would probably be more handsome, but surely it would be more costly.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is to avoid that, after a full and careful consideration of the whole subject, that the committee inserted this provision, in order that we may perhaps furnish our buildings at a less cost hereafter than we have been furnishing them heretofore.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope that will be the result.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to accentuate what has been said by the chairman of the committee. I think we would save a good many thousands of dollars and have a much more economical administration if the entire matter of public buildings and their furnishings were put in the hands of the Supervising Architect and taken entirely out of the hands of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department.

Mr. PERKINS. But the Supervising Architect must take the opinion—no one man can supervise all of these buildings—of a large number of employees.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I believe that Department would work much more economically and would have much more reason to sustain their action than that arising under the charge of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department. To my mind, there is a very foolish division now of responsibility between those two Government officials.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I am by no means sure my friends of the committee are right, but I shall not insist on the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has the gentleman any reason to think the committee is not right?

Mr. PERKINS. A good deal. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes: For expenses incurred under the authority or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in detecting, arresting, and delivering into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction, dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money, and persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and of foreign governments, as well as the coins of the United States and of foreign governments, and other felonies committed against the laws of the United States relating to the pay and bounty laws, including $1,000 to make the necessary investigation of claims for reimbursement of expenses incident to the last sickness and burial of deceased pensioners under section 4718 of the Revised Statutes, the act of March 2, 1895, and for no other purpose whatever, except in the protection of the person of the President of the United States, $115,000: Provided, That no part of this amount be used in defraying the expenses of any person subpœnaed by the United States courts to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend in line 9, page 29, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting the word "twenty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 9, strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "twenty-five," so it will read "$125,000."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, that would make the appropriation the same amount it was last year and has been for several years.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from New York assume that because a certain amount was appropriated last year and for the current year that that money was all spent, and therefore they should have as much next year?

Mr. PARSONS. I know that last year it was not all spent, but I also know that you have appropriated $125,000 for several years, and that in your hearings this year the testimony was that there was an increase in the crime of counterfeiting. I will read what Mr. Moran said in the hearings:

Just now it is on the increase; that is, in the last few months there has been unusual activity. We looked up the records the other day, and compared the last five months with the five months previous to that, and our arrests have almost doubled in that time.

And again later:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you expect to have a surplus this year?

Mr. MORAN. It depends altogether how active counterfeiters become. We husband our resources in shape of emergencies.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any special reason for the activity at this time?

Mr. MORAN. No; unless it is because so many are out of work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has it been your experience that in times of financial depression the counterfeiters become more active?

Mr. MORAN. Yes.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if $125,000 was appropriated in the past, it is additionally proper this year.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, if I understand the gentleman's argument, it is due to the Republican hard times that an additional amount of money is needed to stop counterfeiting?

Mr. PARSONS. No; that is not the gentleman's argument at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a matter of common knowledge that the business of counterfeiting has fallen off instead of increasing all over the country?

Mr. PARSONS. Not now; it is on the increase at present, according to the testimony.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the panic increase counterfeiting? If so, it is the only thing it has increased except soup houses.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to read a paragraph from the testimony of Mr. Moran. Mr. Moran said to the committee:

Of course we try to take care of these men—

Speaking of the men who were employed by the Secret Service in other departments and another service than that in which the law authorizes them to be employed—

Of course we try to take care of these men in the best manner we can. To show that we did not needlessly spend the money, we turned in a surplus of over $19,000 last year, but it was because counterfeiting has been at a low ebb. Just now it is on the increase; that is, within the last few months there has been unusual activity. We looked up the records the other day—

The balance of the paragraph is as read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS]. In view of the fact that they have heretofore had a surplus of $19,000, they would still have a surplus if the expenditures were no greater next year than they were last year, under the appropriation which the committee has given, and the committee did not feel warranted, in view of the fact that it was disclosed to us that there was a surplus, in appropriating more money than the testimony before the committee would show was required for the service.

And, in addition to that, I might say, Mr. Chairman, that while technically there perhaps has been no part of the $125,000 appropriated for the current year, or last year, paid to men in the Service when employed by other Departments, nevertheless it does appear from the testimony that there were about twenty more men maintained on the rolls of the Secret Service during the last year than were necessary for the discharge of the specific duties for which the $125,000 is appropriated. Now, these men were paid out of appropriations made for the other Departments in which they served, but, nevertheless, it was necessary for the Secret Service officer to maintain a larger number of men in consequence of this practice, and I have no doubt in the world that $115,000 will be more than sufficient to meet the requirements of the Service if that service is confined legitimately to the purposes which the law contemplates it shall be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee for some information regarding this particular paragraph. I notice in the paragraph there is a provision made, or it is practically for the purpose of making provision, for arresting men and bringing them to trial who are engaged in counterfeiting, and so forth. Why is it that that is connected with the provision later on relating to the investigation of claims for reimbursement of expenses incident to the last sickness and burial of deceased persons, and also is connected with the provision for protecting the person of the President of the United States? Why are these several subjects connected in this paragraph?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say the statutory provision referred to by the gentleman is an old provision. That Service became necessary shortly after the war, when there were a great many frauds, as we were informed, perpetrated upon the Government in consequence of people claiming the accrued pensions due deceased old soldiers. The provision now could be dropped out of this paragraph, but it was never brought to the attention of the committee before that there had been no investigation and no arrests made under that paragraph, although they have from year to year set aside a thousand dollars for that specific purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what you have done here?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes. A thousand dollars for that specific purpose. Now, we did not feel justified in ceasing that Service, in view of the fact that it is statutory service; but if there is no longer any necessity for it, when we come to consider the next appropriation bill it will probably be dropped if the Department will approve of our doing so.

The provision in regard to the protection of the President was for the first time placed in this paragraph two years ago. Up to that time no officer or employee in the Secret Service was justified in paying any attention whatever to the protection of the President. If any officer was used, and many were used for that purpose, it was in direct violation of the law, if they were paid out of this appropriation; and they were paid out of the appropriation. The necessity for the service was so manifest, and the fact that it could not be had under this provision without inserting that language was the reason why the committee incorporated it in the bill two years ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

No person employed in the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department or under the appropriation for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, who is detailed, furloughed, granted leave of absence, dismissed, or otherwise temporarily or finally separated from the service of such division and is thereafter employed under any other branch of the public service shall be restored or paid compensation for service or expenses in the Secret Service Division for two years after the termination of his employment under such other branch of the Government.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the paragraph just read, from line 16 to line 25.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph is unquestionably subject to the point of order. I hope, however, in view of the testimony that was presented to the Committee on Appropriations regarding this Service, that the gentleman from New York will not insist upon the point of order, and thereby make it possible to continue the practice which obtains now and has obtained for several years of the Department of violating this provision of the appropriation law. It may be said this violation is purely a technical violation; but, nevertheless, while I would not concede that, I want to call attention to what the practice is. The appropriation reads as follows:

And for no other purpose except for the protection of the person of the President of the United States.

So that this appropriation can be expended for no other purposes than those mentioned in the paragraph. As a matter of fact, the testimony of the Assistant Chief of the Secret Service shows that they are maintaining and have for some time maintained on their rolls a force of twenty more men than was necessary for the secret-service work authorized under this appropriation. That necessity grows out of the fact, as he informed us, that they are constantly called upon by other Departments of the Government to furnish men for service in their department.

When this matter was first brought to the attention of the committee, the committee felt that it was its duty to investigate it. Congress was from year to year appropriating $125,000 for this specific service; and if the men employed in the Secret Service were detailed to other Departments and paid from other appropriations, then what becomes of the $125,000 appropriated for that Service in the Treasury Department? On inquiry, however, we found that when a man in the Secret Service of the Treasury Department is transferred or loaned or detailed—and all three words are used to describe the fact—the man employed in that Service is no longer paid out of this appropriation. There is, therefore, to that extent, no violation of the statute. He is paid out of a miscellaneous appropriation made to the Department in which he is then employed.

Mr. LANDIS. Is he paid in accordance with the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, miscellaneous appropriations are usually very general. In the Department of Justice there is no question of their right to pay secret-service men out of the general appropriation for United States courts. There is no question about that. But there might be, and doubtless is, a serious question whether, under existing law and existing miscellaneous appropriations, they could be paid out of these miscellaneous appropriations for the other Departments.

But I say, notwithstanding that he is employed thereafter by another Department, paid for by the other Department, and is not required to take the oath of office, during all this time he remains on the rolls of the Secret Service in the Treasury Department he is under the control of the Chief of the Secret Service, and he makes his reports to the Chief of that Service.

Now, this provision is not intended as an evidence on the part of the committee of its disapproval so much of the employment of secret-service men wherever they are necessary in other Departments as it is to emphasize our disapproval of the practice of using the Secret Service, which is the most important branch of the secret-service work in the Government and which is limited exclusively to the detection of counterfeiting and alleged counterfeiting and the protection of the person of the President. It was for the purpose of stopping the use of this Service in every possible way by the Departments of the Government that this provision was inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman think it desirable to have a general detective service for the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I do not.

Mr. PARSONS. Then would the gentleman have a separate detective force for each Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I would not.

Mr. PARSONS. Well, how would the gentleman, then, have the detective force necessary for the Department of Justice and other Departments that need such a force?

Mr. TAWNEY. There are several answers, Mr. Chairman, that could be made to that question. The same way that the Department of Justice and the other Departments obtained this service prior to the beginning of the present practice. Then there is another objection to a permanent secret service in connection with the administrative departments of the Government. They are on the pay roll constantly. They are always with you; whereas if it becomes necessary—and I do not dispute the fact that at times it may be necessary for the Department of Justice to employ secret-service men. But, when that necessity arises, there is nothing in this provision to prevent the Department of Justice getting the eligible roll in the Treasury Department and simply selecting a man from that roll and employing him for the particular work the Department desires him to do.

Mr. PARSONS. What roll can he be found on?

Mr. TAWNEY. And then when he has completed the work he was employed to do his service ends and he is no longer a Government employee. He has done his job, and he is off the roll. Now, the gentleman asked what roll. If he will read the hearings, he will find Mr. Moran testified that they have a long waiting list of applicants who are waiting for appointment, and they always investigate every applicant in order to determine his qualifications.

They know every man on that roll. They know the extent of his experience. They know his knowledge and his aptness and qualifications for the discharge of the duty of a secret-service man.

Mr. PARSONS. Supposing that to-day the Secret Service is employing forty men, and it needs ten more. It goes to that roll to get them, does it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. What is the difference, then?

Mr. TAWNEY. The difference is this: That if this provision prevails the people employed in the Secret Service will have their services limited to the object for which the Service has been created. They will be permanent, and I will say here that the people employed in that Service welcome this provision, because it tends to elevate and standardize the Service and protects them from the unreasonable prejudice that exists throughout the country against the Secret Service of the Treasury Department. Those people are not opposed to this provision, as we are, to stop the practice that now exists. You will see from the testimony of Mr. Moran himself that he would be very glad to get rid of the matter of keeping men on the rolls for the purpose of supplying requests of this kind, whether they deem the Service necessary or not. Now, if the Departments actually need secret-service men hereafter, this provision does not interfere with their obtaining them. They will have the same opportunity then that they have now. They have no right and can not justify the practice which has obtained here for the last few years of maintaining a larger force than is necessary for the secret-service work in the Treasury Department in order to supply men in other Departments when their employment in other Departments is deemed necessary.

Mr. PARSONS. The compensation of these men is a per diem compensation, is it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Is there any testimony that the men are paid when they are not employed?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Bureau of the Secret Service knows that a demand may come in at any time, and these men are retained on the roll to provide for such an emergency, and of course they are paid while they are waiting. The Bureau may try to give them something to do in order to bridge over the time. Now, this provision will not interfere with any Department of the Government that has legitimate use for the Secret Service obtaining that Service. They can not use the Secret Service of the Treasury Department, which is a permanent organization maintained for the purposes expressed in this paragraph. If there is necessity for the employment of secret-service men in other Departments, that necessity is only temporary, and no detective force ought to be maintained permanently in any Department of the Government except the Treasury. That is the reason for this provision, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I shall feel constrained to make the point of order, but I think I ought to say that I sympathize with the efforts of the committee to make definite and certain that kind of employment. There is no law whatever on the statute books for a secret-service division. This provision has been carried here for forty-three years and from time to time changed to cover other branches of the Government work in other Departments.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has not every change that has been made since the establishment of that Secret Service been a change looking to limiting it to the purpose for which it was established?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It has been just the opposite.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will point to a single instance where the change has been to enlarge it, other than for the protection of the President, and the bounty act, I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Those are the only two there are.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman will find a very broad provision there.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. At one time it said "other felonies against the United States."

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman from New York know that in the past history of this secret service there have been pronounced abuses growing out of the use of the Secret Service for purposes other than those intended?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman does not know those things.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is not very fully informed on the subject, then.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There are many subjects on which the gentleman is not fully informed.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky is perfectly willing to admit that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from New York is endeavoring to obtain the information which the committee has on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is very proper.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If it is desired, as the gentleman from Minnesota seems in a way to think, that some provision should be made for the secret-service work of other Departments, put them in particularly, as looking up bounty matters and protection of the President have been put in; but a certain amount of secret-service work has got to be done by other Departments. It can be done in several ways, by going out and hiring temporary men, but that is a bad way, because they get men who have no permanent adherence to the Government service.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the very thing we want to avoid.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If you want to avoid it, you are not doing it in a skillful manner. Second, they could hire men from a detective agency, and everybody is opposed to that. In the third place, they could make a temporary selection from a body of men whose business it is to know how to detect crime, and that is what this Department has done. I say if the Navy Department wanted $245 worth of work done, that was not enough to warrant a secret-service department of their own.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from New York know what the nature of that work was?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman approve of it?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Absolutely; as long as the service is composed of officers and gentlemen and charges come against one that would warrant his dismissal from the service, and when the Secretary of the Navy has exhausted the ordinary sources inside the Department itself, I say it is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to follow up that case and procure the evidence on which to convict the officer and turn him out of the service for the violation of the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are courts-martial for?

Mr. BENNET of New York. To act after you get the evidence. That is what this $245 was spent for.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think the Government ought to be mulcted in money to go around and hunt up the private conduct of these fellows?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not in many cases, but I submit to the gentleman from Missouri that there may occasionally occur situations where the Government ought to do these things.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman another question solely for information for myself.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Very well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that the secret-service men ever kept anybody from being shot?

Mr. BENNET of New York. From being shot?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; any President or any functionary of the Government?

Mr. BENNET of New York. How do I know?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They did not prevent the shooting of Mr. McKinley.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I can tell the gentleman every man that has been shot despite the secret-service men, but I can not tell him every man that the secret-service men have saved from being shot. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There was a secret-service man standing right by the side of President McKinley when he was shot, was there not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; and yet the President was shot.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from New York indicate what kind of private conduct by an officer of the Government he considers should be investigated by the Secret Service, and should it apply to officers of the Navy, to officers of the Army, men in the Departments, Members of Congress, Senators, or what shall be the line?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I shall not attempt to answer any such blanket question as that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I will make it a little less of a blanket.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman indicate what private conduct of an officer or employee of the Government should be investigated at the instigation of the head of any Department of this Government?

Mr. BENNET of New York. None whatever, except such as affect him in his public capacity.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a statement that does not mean anything. What does the gentleman consider should be the class of conduct, and who is to be the judge of whether it affects him in his public or private capacity? Does the gentleman think that heads of Departments should have the right to determine, and if they so determine that the private conduct of the individual affects him in his public capacity, shall they investigate the matter with secret-service men?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think this Navy case, the history of which some gentlemen here are familiar with——

Mr. SHERLEY. What are the facts in that case?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Without telling any names, I am ready to state the facts. Here is a case where a naval officer of previous very high and irreproachable character, so far as the Department knew, was absent on leave. There came to the office of the Acting Secretary of the Navy one day a very estimable lady of Washington, who charged that gentleman with conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, to wit, that he had abducted her daughter. The Secretary of the Navy exhausted the ordinary means within the Navy of ascertaining the whereabouts of that officer.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Was not her daughter a married woman?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That makes it worse. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am trying to get all the facts; she was a married woman?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly; after the Secretary of the Navy had exhausted all the means at his command, he called in either one or two, I do not know which, secret-service officers, who simply, after a lapse of a few days, reported to the Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A few days of shadowing, I suppose the gentleman means?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not. After a few days investigating, to find out where he was, they reported that he was at a certain place, and there their connection with the case ended. The Secretary of the Navy sent for the naval officer, and he was subsequently separated from the service. I maintain that in a case like that the Secretary of the Navy, or the head of any other Department, for instance, the Secretary of War, has the right to do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, whenever a charge is made against any officer, on leave or not on leave, that he has been guilty of conduct unbecoming a gentleman and an officer, the Secretary of the Navy is warranted in employing the secret-service man to shadow that man in order to prove whether those charges are well founded or not.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at all; and I do not so state.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, let us find out the gentleman's point.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I stated that the Secretary of the Navy desired to locate the officer, and that he was unable through the officers of the Navy Department and through the regular channels——

Mr. SHERLEY. The man was on leave.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. He had a right to be away.

Mr. BENNET of New York. On leave, and he was charged with a serious and most grave crime.

Mr. SHERLEY. But let us not confuse the issues.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is a part of the issue.

Mr. SHERLEY. The man was on leave.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the gentleman thinks the Secretary of the Navy was warranted in putting a secret-service man on that man's trail?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think he was not only justified, but that it is his duty, an officer of the Navy being charged with crime, whether on leave or on duty, to send for that officer, to start investigations, to court-martial him, and if he was guilty to separate him from the service.

Mr. SHERLEY. That does not necessarily involve, and heretofore has not involved, the use of a secret-service man.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It may not be necessary, but it did in this case involve it, and it has in other cases involved it, and I think that when these rare cases arise——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that if the accusation was made against a Member of Congress that he had been guilty of conduct unbecoming a gentleman and a Member of Congress that a Department would be warranted in investigating his conduct by a secret-service man?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman is a gentleman of very high erudition, and he knows, of course——

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, let us dispense with the compliments, and get down to the case.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Very well; now, I will give the gentleman some facts. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I am prepared to admit that anything that adduces a fact from the gentleman is warranted.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Very well. He knows, as we all know, who are lawyers and have given any thought to the subject, that we are not Federal officers, that we are not State officers, that we are a component part of the Government. There is nobody over us. We are the Congress of the United States and the judges of our own conduct.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it not true in the Navy, that it is a part of the standing regulations that a man must never go on leave so that his address shall not be known to the Department? He has to be where they can find him, if he is required for duty, at a moment's notice.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That ought to be the regulation, whether it is or not.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am glad to find that it is, and when this man could not be found, in obedience to that regulation I say it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy in that case, himself a gentleman of the highest character, to find this man and give him a chance to face his accusers and his accusers a chance to face him.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman may be aware of the fact that this secret service at one time was used for the purpose of looking into the personal conduct of a Member of Congress, notwithstanding the gentleman seems to think that they are answerable to no one.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman is not aware of anything of that kind. As far as the gentleman has investigated it has been denied.

Mr. SHERLEY. But that was the fact.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The allegation was made, if the gentleman will permit, that that particular investigation was made not by a member of the Secret Service, but by a police officer of the city of Washington, who, when it was ascertained that he had done that, was summarily dismissed from the police force. The gentleman from New York has heard that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman know the origin of this remarkable language, "for no other purpose whatever," in this section?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from New York is not informed as to that. This statute is forty-three years old.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not this part of it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from New York does not even know that. The gentleman from New York is confining his remarks to the matters which he does know.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit. He spoke about this Service being forty-three years old. This Service was established in 1882. The first appropriation was made in 1864, during the war, and that is the first time that the Secret Service was ever authorized by Congress in the history of the Government. Congress then appropriated $100,000 for this special purpose, and the division was not created until 1882.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The division has never been created by statute, except as it has been carried in the annual appropriation bills. I make the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Would the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, for two years past some investigation has been made into this subject by the Committee on Appropriations. It appears that this division was in fact created by an appropriation, as stated by the gentleman from New York, and at one time the language was so broad as to authorize the use of this Secret Service for investigation of all felonies. After certain gross abuses of it about twenty-five years ago, a provision was put into this appropriation that it should be used for the enumerated purposes and for no other purposes whatever.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not until I finish this statement, then I will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, that was the only way in which any limitation could be put upon the activities of this Secret Service. It existed only in the appropriation authorizing it, and when Congress provided that no person employed under this appropriation could be used for any other purpose whatever than those enumerated in the statute, although it only operated as a limitation technically upon the appropriation, it was a specific declaration of Congressional purpose that the men in this division should not be used for any other purpose whatever. Scarcely had this statute been put upon the books when a deliberate plan was made by which the object and purpose of it was wholly defeated. By putting sixty-seven men on the roll when the appropriation would only pay forty-seven men, and then loaning those men from this roll to be paid out of some other appropriation, exactly the system was reinstated that had been sought to be destroyed by this act of Congress.

Does the gentleman mean seriously to say that when Congress adopted this amendment that this force, under the appropriation, should be used for no purpose whatever except this specifically enumerated, its only object was to transfer the charge to some other appropriation? Abuses existed and were the subject of complaint at the time. This was the only place where the Secret Service was authorized, and in this place it provided they should be used for no other purposes whatever except those therein enumerated, and while it must be said that within the meaning of accounting laws they have not violated this statute, it has been defied time and again in spirit [applause], and the very purpose of it has been defeated at all times in recent years. I submit that all this committee is asking is that the expressed and declared purpose of Congress existing for a quarter of a century shall be obeyed by this division of the Secret Service. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert, after line 15, page 29:

"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used in payment of compensation or expenses of any person detailed or transferred from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department, or who may at any time during the fiscal year 1909 have been employed in or under said Secret Service Division."

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, that is a limitation upon the appropriation, an express limitation, and it involves no legislation and the point of order would not lie against it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is not properly a limitation, because there is no such division as the Secret Service, and therefore no appropriation for the Secret Service Division, and this appropriation is no limitation on anything, but a separate legislative provision. The Chair will search the statutes of the United States in vain for anything authorizing any such a body as the Secret Service Division.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not necessary that there should be any law creating the Secret Service Division. Does the gentleman deny that there is a Secret Service Division in fact?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly. There is no such thing as a Secret Service Division.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It exists in fact, does it not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. You do not even find the name on the door.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will read from the current law to show whether the name is on the door if it is not in the gentleman's head:

The Secret Service Division: One chief, $4,000; assistant chief, who shall discharge the duties of a clerk, $3,000; one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; two clerks of class 2—

And so on. I have the act here when this was created. In 1882 the provision was made for the Secret Service Division and the appointment of a chief and an assistant chief.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But, Mr. Chairman, that is an entirely different appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You said there was no Secret Service Division.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What we are now considering is the specific appropriation for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, which does not mention the Secret Service Division in any way whatever, and therefore there is no limitation. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] may just as well say that no part of the money appropriated in here for dredging Ambrose channel shall be used for this, because there is nothing in here that says this has any connection whatever with the Secret Service Division, and therefore, even if the amendment was adopted, it would not apply to this particular appropriation. An additional point is that it is not germane to this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY], if there is an appropriation in this bill anywhere for the Secret Service?

Mr. TAWNEY. No. In the legislative bill, and this is for the Secret Service—the Treasury Department.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Then, I respectfully submit, if the appropriation was in the legislative bill, the limitation belongs to the appropriation and not in some other bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is a limitation, Mr. Chairman, upon all of the appropriations carried in the sundry civil bill, and provides that none of them shall be used for the payment or compensation or expenses to anyone employed from the Secret Service in any of the Departments during the fiscal year 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is a limitation on the appropriation in the bill, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to be heard briefly on the amendment. I assume, although I have not had time to absorb the language particularly, that if this limitation is adopted, the Secret Service of the United States, or other Departments of the Government, will be driven, when they have to do work, which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations concedes that they have to do from time to time, outside of Government service, either to men employed temporarily for a day or two, and with no particular interest in the Government, or to the agents of hired detective agencies.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The law prohibits that now.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Which I was just going to say was prohibited by law, so that they will either have to violate the law or take men with whose training and antecedents they are absolutely unfamiliar. As it is now, they can go to this Secret Service Bureau, where they have the best trained men in the United States; men who have done splendid work; men who know about crime, and take them for a day or two, pay them out of their appropriation, and then let them go back to their own employment. It only means a question of twenty men a year. It is a very small item, and it keeps the integrity of the proceedings of the different Departments, or absolutely protects the proceedings of the different Departments of the Government. I do not think the limitation is wise, and it ought to be voted down.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted. Those who have given any attention to this matter know that there have been gross abuses growing out of the use of the men in the Secret Service by the various Departments of the Government. It should be stopped. These men——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Suppose another Department wants a man, a competent man, to do some detective work, secret-service work, and the men in this Bureau, that are getting about $125,000 a year, are not all busy, what great harm can be done if one of these men should be detailed to do that work instead of keeping up a permanent force in the other Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed for five minutes I may answer his question. That is what I am going to discuss.

The Secret Service Division has an eligible list of 304, and whenever they require the services of more men than they have they take a man from this list. Numerous instances have come to the observation of many Members of the House where this secret-service force has been employed upon service upon which they should not have been employed.

Congress appropriates a certain amount of money to employ a certain number of men in this Secret Service for a certain specific purpose. They should be restricted to that work. They should not be given a roving commission, so that they may be assigned to any kind of work, to investigate the action of all kinds of persons, whether in the Government service or not.

There has been an effort once or twice to create a general police system under the Federal Government. It has not been successful. But if the practice be continued, which has been in force for some years, not many, but recently, of having carried apparently upon the rolls of the Secret Service twenty more men than are necessary or are required for that work, and appropriations continue, then we will have in time a Federal secret police. What does the ordinary district attorney do when he requires work of this character done? It is not necessary for him to apply to the Secret Service. He can easily secure competent men within his jurisdiction to do any work of this character that is required. And so with every Department of the Government; whenever it requires a man of particular qualifications in any locality, it can easily find a man to do the work required.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does not my colleague recall, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa, that the Government is prevented, and properly prevented, from going to the same place that a lawyer would go, that is to a generally recognized detective agency in order to get the character of work done?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where some lawyers go.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Most lawyers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not most lawyers; some lawyers. Everybody knows what that law is. After the railroad strike in Chicago a law was passed prohibiting the employment of the Pinkerton and similar detective agencies. But it is easy enough to get competent men for such work who are not employed by those agencies. The Secret Service Division has an eligible list of 304 men, men applying from all parts of the country. It would be very easy for a Department, if it required an odd man, to pick him out from this list rather than have him carried in this list of secret-service men.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the possibilities of abuse of such a system as has grown up, and that this amendment is intended to correct, to my mind more than outweighs any inconvenience that may happen to a Department. The gentleman from New York goes on the assumption that it is necessary for the Departments to have secret-service men. I am not quite prepared to admit that proposition, at least as a general proposition; and if it be true that they need, for certain purposes, to have secret-service men, they should come to Congress and get authorization by Congress for the employment of this class of men. There is always a tendency on the part of bureau government to use means such as these to carry out what they consider to be the legitimate purposes of their creation; but there may be, and frequently is, very great difference of opinion as to what is a legitimate purpose. The gentleman from New York thinks that the Secretary of the Navy properly employed secret-service men in order to find out the details concerning a scandal in connection with a naval officer.

Mr. BENNET of New York. "The gentleman from New York" did not say that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am simply taking the statement of the gentleman and the facts of the case, and I understood him to justify the action of the Secretary.

Mr. BENNET of New York. In locating the man.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the location of the man was not a question with the Department, to know where that man was while on leave, but the location of the man by the Secret Service was really for the purpose of making charges against him in connection with some scandalous conduct of his. Now, I deny that it is the business of the Secretary of the Navy, or the Secretary of War, or any other Secretary, to employ secret-service men to dig up the private scandals of men.

I do not mean to uphold the scandals, but I do not believe this country has reached a point where it needs that sort of supervision over men's conduct by Government, and by secret-service methods. That is the reason I am opposed to it. Let the Departments come openly. They have been evading the plain spirit of the law and they know it. There is not a man who can justify what has been done in the face of that statute. The statute expressly says that these men shall be used for certain enumerated purposes, and for none other. Now, they could not avoid the meaning of that statute, and so they try to circumscribe it by detailing, by dropping men from the rolls temporarily, in order that they may be picked up by other Departments, and they frankly confess that they keep on their rolls a greater number than the needs of their service require in order that they may be able to detail those men to other Departments. It is treating Congress and its laws with absolute contempt, and I desire to voice my protest against this attempt of the Departments to determine what is necessary and legal, rather than to let the lawmaking part of the Government make that determination. I hope the limitation will prevail.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a good deal of care to this proposition while it was being discussed on the point of order and on the merits, and I must confess that the more I have heard of it from both sides the more I am convinced that this amendment should not prevail.

This amendment, as I take it, is intended to accomplish exactly, or substantially, the same end that would be accomplished by leaving the paragraph in the bill which was stricken out on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York. Now, I believe that while the Treasury Department should have a great force of these secret-service men, because that Department needs that force for more purposes and more times in the year than any other, yet other bureaus and Departments may need the assistance of secret-service men from time to time. They may need the services of detectives for certain purposes——

Mr. SHERLEY. If they have such need, why not let them present the need to Congress and have Congress authorize it?

Mr. DRISCOLL. There should not be a secret-service bureau in each Department, any more than there should be a Government printing office in each Department. It is economical, it is businesslike, and it is symmetrical to keep them together. Let there be a Secret Service Bureau, or men clothed with power, if you please, to do secret-service work of the Government. Let them do the most of their work where it is most required; but where men are required to do detective work in other Departments, let them be detailed from this Service to do that. It tends toward economy; it tends toward keeping together the things that have been discovered in this work.

Mr. SHERLEY. You are acting on the assumption that the need exists. Now, if it exists, let the Department show it and ask Congress to authorize it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Certainly I go on the supposition that the need exists, and while it does not exist in all the Departments, all the time, it may exist sometimes. I do not care who the officer is who has control of these secret-service men. Let them detail a man if it is necessary to do so. I believe the men should be detailed from time to time to do the detective work. Let the chief of the bureau detail the men, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or some other man, I do not care who. These men that are regularly employed in the Secret Service may not be required all the time in one Department. Their time should be occupied, and when they are required in other Departments, why should they not be detailed? They are the most competent. The men in the Secret Service can take advantage of all the information which is obtained by that Service, in that way adding to the sum of the knowledge possessed by the Service in relation to the criminals of the country. Therefore it seems to me, for effective work as well as for economy, the men now constituting the Secret Service should be detailed to do the other work of a similar character, and this amendment should not prevail.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat proceeds upon the theory that it is necessary for us to maintain a permanent secret-service organization in the various Executive Departments of the Government.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I stated just the opposite; that it ought not to be necessary to do that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, if it is not necessary to maintain the permanent secret-service organization, the gentleman was talking in favor of the amendment instead of against it. For the logical conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York would lead inevitably to the maintenance of a permanent secret service in all the Departments of this Government or the maintenance of a secret service in all Executive Departments of the Government. Now, do gentlemen in opposition to this amendment propose to indorse and approve the practice that has obtained during the last few years under this appropriation of violating the law by detailing men from the Secret Service to other Departments of the Government?

Mr. PARSONS. Violating what law?

Mr. TAWNEY. Violating the provisions in the appropriation act. Why, I have in my possession a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, received a few days ago, in which he has pointed out to me the practice of the Treasury Department, whereby he himself admits that the provisions under which this appropriation is made have been violated year after year for a number of years in his own Department.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not intended by him and by this amendment to accomplish just what was sought to be accomplished in the paragraph that was stricken out on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York. Does not he intend to accomplish the same thing?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and to accomplish exactly what Congress intended should be accomplished when it wrote the provision in the paragraph that the money should be expended for the purposes enumerated, and for none other.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish the gentleman would answer my question—if it is not intended to accomplish what was intended to be accomplished by the paragraph stricken out on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; to a certain extent.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, then, one more question. Is not the subject of that that no man can be detailed from the secret-service system to any other Bureau or Department; and if he is, he will be dismissed from the Service, and therefore it can not be done? And if so, was I not talking to the point under consideration? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that that is exactly what is intended, and that is what the law now intends. It was never contemplated that the employees of the Secret Service should be used for any other purpose than that named in the paragraph, namely, for counterfeiting, protection of the person of the President, and the other two purposes named.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That is where the gentleman and I differ. I contend that there should be but one Secret Service Bureau, and that men should be detailed to other bureaus to do the work necessary in those bureaus.

Mr. TAWNEY. That would make a secret service for all the Departments, exactly what we now have. The assistant chief of the Secret Service testified before the committee that they maintained on their rolls twenty more people than was necessary to accomplish the object for which this appropriation is made and twenty more than could be paid out of the appropriation.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Did the assistant chief say that they maintained them under pay?

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not say so. I said that he maintains them on the roll as secret-service men, and maintains twenty more than can be paid out of the appropriation, but they are paid out of other appropriations made to other Departments of the Government. Now, they know that it is not lawful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. They know that this is not lawful, and the members of the Secret Service themselves are not hunting for this work. Let me read you what Mr. Moran stated when before the committee. You will find it in the hearings at the bottom of page 192:

> The CHAIRMAN. How can they be compensated for the service? The statute expressly prohibits compensation until the oath of office has been taken.

Before I read this statement, let me state the fact that when these men are employed in the other Departments of the Government they do not take the oath of office, notwithstanding the statute which prohibits compensation to any man in the public service until he has taken the oath of office, and that fact is admitted by Mr. Moran.

Mr. Moran then says:

> My understanding is that they pay them a lump sum for the work they do in some places. We do not go after this work, and we would not care to-morrow if it was all stopped. We do not want it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Of course they do not want it. They want their pay for doing nothing.

Mr. TAWNEY. They know that the Secret Service of the Treasury Department has been created for a specific object and has a purpose entirely distinct and separate from the ordinary secret service maintained in the municipalities and throughout the States, and they want to be allowed to continue their work in that particular line. They are not seeking, as Mr. Moran says, employment in other Departments. Then I asked him this question:

> The CHAIRMAN. Here is the oath of office prescribed by the statutes upon which salaries can be paid. It is contained in section 1756 of the Revised Statutes:
> "SEC. 1756. Every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit, either in the civil, military, or naval service, excepting the President and the other persons embraced by the section following, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any part of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath:"

Then follows the oath. These men, before they can accept employment in any other Department, must be separated from the Secret Service in the Treasury Department. They go to work in some other Department, and they do not even conform to the law, which says that before anybody can receive pay for a service, or other emoluments, they must take the prescribed oath of office. So that I say the practice has been going on here in various ways, and the law of Congress has been violated in respect to the employment of this Service. As I said before, this provision will not in any way cripple any Department in its administration. They can go to the eligible list of over 300 men in the Secret Service Division in the Treasury Department and there look over the waiting candidates or applicants and select the man they want. They know every man's record, and they can employ whomsoever they want.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield in a moment. When these men have completed their employment, their service in the Government ceases, and that is my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, who would have them employed.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Why should they have to go and pick out men on this waiting list, not employed, when there are a lot of men doing nothing, drawing pay, and who are better able to do it?

Mr. TAWNEY. That condition does not exist.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There will not be any men not doing anything.

Mr. TAWNEY. That condition does not exist, or will not exist if this provision is adopted. I maintain whenever there is any necessity for the employment of secret-service agents that that necessity is temporary, and when the work is done that man's connection with the service in the Government should end there. If you retain him permanently on the roll, after he has completed one job, while he is perhaps working on it, he will be manufacturing some employment in order to continue and justify his permanent employment. If he is not in the employ of the Government permanently and can be employed only for a specific piece of work, when that work ends his service ends, and he is no longer a Federal employee. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I want this committee to understand some things that this amendment will do if it is adopted. You take, for instance, the prosecutions against what are known as "trusts." [Laughter.] We have turned in something over $700,000—oh, gentlemen can laugh at it here, but they will not laugh at it on the stump in the fall.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where has any of them ever been prosecuted?

Mr. BENNET of New York. We have turned in something like $700,000 in fines in the southern district of New York alone. In the investigations that are going on all the time we are using, or the district attorney there is using, the secret-service men. If you adopt this amendment, under the language of it he can never take one of those witnesses over there. He can not pay his expenses; he can not pay him any compensation. You make utterly useless the efforts that have been made through the Secret Service for the last three or four years in these antitrust prosecutions in New York City.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman means in State prosecutions or Federal?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I mean in Federal prosecutions. Up there the other day they found there was trouble in relation to the ink contracts in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, the gentleman says "the other day." That was three years ago.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, it is a great deal more recent than the case my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] cited. They found there was trouble there, and they took and put a secret-service man at work there and found how the Government had been defrauded out of $45,000 by a man from my own city.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman now permit me to correct him there? That work was not done by the secret-service men. That work was done by a clerk in the office who has since been promoted in recognition and as a reward for that service.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. TAWNEY. We carried in the appropriation two years ago a provision promoting him as a reward for his services.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am glad he received promotion.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the secret-service men did not accomplish that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But the work was largely done by the secret-service men. The same way with the defalcation at the mint at San Francisco and at other places where crimes were alleged against men, they used secret-service men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman to indulge me—we will get him more time. Has the Government used the Secret Service in procuring evidence in these antitrust-law suits?

Mr. BENNET of New York. To procure evidence and procure the attendance of witnesses and if this limitation goes through they will be cut out of all that sort of thing and they will be left in New York, against some of the smoothest, brightest lawyers, against some of the brightest, smartest men——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And you might say, some of the "slickest" men God ever let live.

Mr. BENNET of New York (continuing). Absolutely defenseless.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York will permit, he knows very well this limitation will not interfere with the attendance of any witness in the trial of any case in any court, either State or Federal.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman knows nothing of the kind under this amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then the gentleman does not know the English language.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the Government used secret-service agents in getting up testimony in these lawsuits?

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be now closed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman answer my question, whether or not the Government uses these secret-service agents to get evidence in these lawsuits?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not used the secret service, but it has used secret-service men.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Customs service: To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, $4,500,000, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. And the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stat., p. 386), as amended by the act of April 27, 1904 (33 Stat., p. 396), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to expend out of the appropriation for defraying the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs such amount as he may deem necessary, not exceeding $150,000 per annum, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, are hereby further amended so as to increase the amount to be so expended for the fiscal year 1909 to $200,000.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offered that amendment for the purpose of asking a few questions of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I notice this provides $4,500,000 to defray the expenses for collecting the revenue from customs in addition to the permanent appropriation for that purpose, which I notice is $5,500,000. That makes altogether $10,000,000 appropriated in this paragraph to defray the expenses of collecting revenue from customs, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose direction I assume this money is expended, makes a report to Congress or to the Committee on Appropriations showing in any detail the manner in which the money is spent?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary makes such a report to Congress at the beginning of each session. He is required by law to do it, and then he is required in addition to the reporting of the expenditures to make a detailed estimate of the expenditures for the next fiscal year. That report shows the number of people employed and shows the compensation paid to each of them. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] can secure a copy of the document containing all that information in the House document room. I can not give him the number of it.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman's answer gives me the information I desire.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is House Document No. 499.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. The total expenses of collecting the customs is about ten millions?

Mr. TAWNEY. Ten millions.

Mr. PERKINS. How much is the total amount collected?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say for the information of the gentleman from New York that in all probability we will have to, before the close of this session, or at the next session, appropriate about $325,000 in addition to the $10,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. How much has the Government collected from customs?

Mr. TAWNEY. The total customs revenue amounts to between three and four million.

Mr. PERKINS. This is then a ratio of expense of over 2½ per cent?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that very high?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is very high, and it will always continue to be high as long as we continue the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000, and continue also the large number of useless custom-houses and customs districts in the United States. A great deal of the expense of collecting customs revenue is due to the fact that we are maintaining customs districts and officers and custom-houses where there is no revenue collected whatever.

Mr. PERKINS. Which ought not to be the case.

Mr. TAWNEY. Which ought not to be, but the House has on several occasions endeavored to repeal that provision, and has in all cases failed.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman why the custom of making a permanent appropriation increases the expense of this service?

Mr. TAWNEY. In my judgment, one of the causes for the increased cost of collecting the customs revenue over the cost of collecting the internal revenue is due to the fact that a single officer of the Government has it in his discretion to spend such a large sum of money. We appropriate in a lump sum. The expenditure of that money is entirely under his control and without any legislative limitation whatever.

Mr. SCOTT. Why can not the Congress by the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations limit that discretion by setting out this appropriation in detail, instead of making a lump-sum appropriation, or, at least, the part of it which we control in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman, I think, can readily see that to attempt to classify or provide specifically for a part of the force, and the remainder of the force to be paid out of a lump sum would be wholly impractical if not impossible.

Mr. PERKINS. Why can not we control the $5,000,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. We can, if we can repeal the permanent appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. Why can we not do it?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Committee on Appropriations has repeatedly recommended the repeal and carried provisions for the repeal in the sundry civil bill. I will say at the last session of Congress—I do not know whether the Members of the House knew it or not, but I do know that no member of the committee took any pains to inform the membership of the House—we carried a provision repealing the permanent, indefinite appropriation for the collection of customs which aggregated about $900,000 a year, and in consequence of that repeal the lump sum is that much greater, but the fees and fines which were heretofore appropriated for the collection of the customs revenue are now turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and are not expended, and without any report for the accounting of the same to Congress as heretofore. So we have succeeded in getting that much of the permanent appropriation for the collection of customs wiped off the statute books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] make the point of order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I reserve the point of order, because I see the change of existing law here increases the amount to be paid out for this particular purpose by statute, and I reserve the point of order for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee the necessity for this increase, because I think we are increasing the cost of the customs service enough already; and though there is a very good reason for an increase here, I make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. What paragraph?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On page 30 of the bill. The paragraph under the head of "Customs service," that provides for the amendment of the act of March 3, 1897, as amended by the act of April 27, 1904, "authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to expend out of the appropriation for defraying expenses of collecting the revenue from customs," and so forth. Formerly the appropriation was $150,000, as fixed by law. As I understand, this bill seeks to change the law and increase the appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. The appropriation is increased above the statutory amount.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is an increase of the amount allowed by law for that purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the amount in the current appropriation act, and has been the amount appropriated for the last two years. We increased it to $200,000 last year because of the statements that were made to us by the Treasury Department in respect to the amount expended the previous year and of the amount that would be necessary to be expended this year, and this year the recommendation of the Department was to make this a permanent provision, and that the committee declined to do. But their representations were to the effect that they should have at least $200,000 this year in order to carry on the service as required by statute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the chairman of the committee that I find in the hearings Mr. Lyman says:

> Under the law of 1897 the appropriation was $150,000, and I think that was all expended, and an increase to $200,000 asked for, and it is desired that $200,000 shall be appropriated for the next fiscal year.

Well, I do not see from this hearing that he offers any light on the question as to why increase should be made; and my objection to the proposition is, according to what the chairman of the committee has said only a moment ago, that the cost of the collection of the customs service is so much greater than it ought to be that I am not in favor of giving this as a permanent increase now.

Mr. TAWNEY. This provides for a particular branch of the service which I do not think either the gentleman from Alabama or the committee want to curtail, and that is in the detection of frauds upon the customs revenue. There has never been any evidence before the committee that there was any unnecessary amount of money expended under this provision, and in the very nature of things the gentleman will see that it could not be extravagantly expended, for the reason that it is expended for the purpose of detecting fraud and protecting the revenue.

It is not all spent in this country, I should say. These frauds are committed against the revenue not only at home, but many of them are initiated in foreign countries. Under this provision we have agents employed in foreign countries, who are engaged in the particular work of prying into and ferreting out contemplated frauds on the revenue and the perpetrators of the same. They send that information to the officials here, who provide for the punishment of the guilty parties when the things arrive. I do not think that the gentleman from Alabama will want to restrict that service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it would be far from me——

Mr. TAWNEY. And, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] informs me, this service pays a larger dividend than any appropriation in connection with the public service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is possible it does. It would be far from my purpose to hamper the detection of frauds perpetrated on the customs revenue. My object in making the point of order was this: When I looked at the hearings I saw no explanation made by Mr. Lyman, who asked for the additional money for this fiscal year, to show why this increase should be made.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman, in regard to the gentleman who appeared before us in behalf of the estimates for the collection of the customs revenue, he did not illuminate the subject to any great extent, but he appeared because of the absence of those who were more intimate with the matter, and we relied largely upon information obtained from the Treasury Department subsequent to his appearance. Since that time the Department has communicated with the members of the committee—I know it has with myself—in regard to the necessity for this amount, and also in regard to an increased amount which we have not yet concluded to give.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, on the statement of the chairman of the committee that he has information from the Treasury Department that this increase is necessary, I will withdraw my point of order, but I say that I think it is important for the Appropriation Committee, as well as the Ways and Means Committee, to look to the question of reducing the cost of collecting the custom revenue.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Lands and other property of the United States: For custody, care, protection, and expenses of sales of lands and other property of the United States, the examination of titles, recording of deeds, advertising, and auctioneers' fees, $300.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. In lines 5 to 9, inclusive, on page 31, there is an appropriation of only $300 for the custody, care, protection, and so forth, of the lands and other property of the United States, the examination of titles, recording of deeds, advertising, and auctioneers' fees. What is that?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is land that comes into the possession of the Government as the result of forfeitures and litigation. There is only a very small amount of it, but it comes from all the various miscellaneous sources through which the Government could acquire land by forfeiture or litigation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It occurred to me that that phraseology was broad enough to cover all the lands of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. As long as we can keep the appropriation where it ought to be, we are not so particular about the phraseology.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For maintenance of marine hospitals, including subsistence, and for all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $235,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I take this occasion to make a few observations about the administration of the quarantine service of the United States and what I believe to be a very serious mistake now being made in the administration of that branch of the public service. The Government of the United States, and the Government of Cuba, over which island we now have a provisional administration, have spent a vast amount of money in trying to exterminate certain diseases that are occasionally epidemic in that island, particularly yellow fever.

A few years ago, when we were occupying the island, our medical officers offered themselves, in a spirit of the noblest self-sacrifice, for the investigation of that important question. Lives were sacrificed, and a great scientific discovery was made, one of vast importance to the human race, one which advanced medical science to an enormous degree. It was established then, if anything in the scientific world is ever established, that the spread of yellow fever is very largely, if not entirely, due to the bites of the Stegomyia mosquito.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when we went back for the second provisional occupation of the island of Cuba there were a few cases of yellow fever in that island. Immediately energetic effort was made to get rid of the fever. That effort met with the most flattering and immediate success. Under the able administration of Doctor Kean, of the United States Medical Corps, yellow fever has been driven completely out of the island.

Some branch of the War Department, I do not know which, has just issued a document appertaining to a quarantine lately established against supposed yellow fever in Cuba. Now, as a matter of fact, it develops that this quarantine is against suspicion and not against facts. This quarantine is established because a certain month in the year has rolled around, because we have reached a certain date on the calendar, and not because yellow fever exists. Major Kean, speaking upon his authority and responsibility as the chief medical officer of the United States Army, and after having devoted himself for months to an investigation of the question, declares that, in his judgment, there is not in the entire island a case of yellow fever. Yet commerce is impeded and intercourse between that island and this country has been practically discontinued, because of an arbitrary quarantine, established by one man in the city of Washington. The sources of information possessed by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service are not, and under the circumstances can not be, as good as are those of the medical corps of the Army and, through them, the Secretary of War.

Earnest protests have been made by the War Department, through the Secretary and by the American governor of the island of Cuba, against the establishment of this quarantine at this time as wholly unnecessary. Mr. Chairman, I protest that it is unfair to the people of the island of Cuba and ultimately likely to cause us trouble.

If we show that we have no faith in our own scientifically established truths, what reason can be urged when the government has been turned over to them again for the continuance of the extravagant expenses for sanitation which they have undertaken? They can reasonably say that if, after the fever has been expelled from the islands, if after they shall have taken every step commanded by science, we still disregard it and because we have reached a certain period in the year established a quarantine, there is no reason why they should go on with the enormous expenditure.

The city of Habana has just undertaken an expenditure of $15,000,000 for a sewage and water system. The city of Cienfuegos, on the southern coast, has also undertaken an expediture of $3,000,000 for the same purpose, all in the interest of public health and practically all dictated by the necessities of keeping open intercourse with the United States, where the bulk of their trade lies. They have cheerfully, as I understand, accepted every suggestion made to them by our medical officers, and, in the opinion of the people best informed, there is absolutely no excuse for the quarantine that has been lately put up.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it is very doubtful in my mind if Congress has acted wisely in the past by putting in the hands of any one man the power to establish a quarantine, arbitrarily, that is entirely unjustified by the facts. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

IMMIGRATION STATIONS.

Immigration station, Angel Island, Cal.: For completing buildings and appurtenances in accordance with specifications, $45,000: Provided, That the cost of furnishings and equipments for the station shall be paid from the permanent appropriation for expenses of regulating immigration.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 11, page 35, insert the following as a new paragraph after the word "immigration:"

"For the establishment upon a site to be ceded to or purchased by the Government for the purpose of an immigration station at the port of Boston, Mass., including erection of necessary buildings or improvement of structure already existing or suited to remodeling which might be located on site selected, $250,000, said sum to be paid out of the permanent fund known as the immigration fund."

Mr. KELIHER. I can not consistently contend that there is not new legislation involved in this amendment, but I do claim that if legislating in an appropriation bill can ever be justified, my proposition furnishes an excellent example. The theory that all proposed legislation shall be considered by committees of both branches of the Congress has been carried out to the fullest extent in this case.

Boston's need of a new immigration station is urgent, aye, it is imperative. The dictates of common humanity, as well as the requirements of effectual administration, demand that a proper station be provided, and at once.

Mr. Chairman, I had the honor as the representative of the district in which is located the present inadequate, insanitary, fire-trap building which is utilized for a detention station, to present a bill last January which provides for a new station. I presented facts and figures in support of the project to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and secured a unanimous report in favor of an authorization of the use of $250,000 from the existent immigrant fund for the purpose specified.

This meritorious measure now slumbers peacefully, with nearly 150 others of more or less merit, upon the Union Calendar, where it is likely to repose indefinitely, at least till after adjournment, notwithstanding the crying need of my city for its enactment.

In the Senate a similar measure has been passed and is now awaiting action by the very committee which reports the pending bill. Surely it can not be urged that an attempt is being made to get through legislation which has not been duly and thoroughly considered. A Senate committee has passed upon the proposition involved in my amendment and the Senate has ratified its action. The proper House committee has reported favorably upon it after most careful consideration, and in view of the fact that it will pass this body if not molested by a point of order it seems as if its merit would justify the Member from Minnesota in allowing it to pass without invoking the rule which it doubtlessly contravenes.

Mr. Chairman, that the committee may more fully comprehend the urgent need of this station at Boston, let me hurriedly outline the salient reasons for its passage. In the first place it will not necessitate the expenditure of a single dollar from the General Treasury. A fund amounting to nearly $4,000,000, which is mainly derived from the head tax, is now available. This money is held for the purpose of operating the laws pertaining to immigration. It is a separate and distinct fund which is raised by the means I have stated and for just such purposes as my amendment proposes.

Boston is the second largest port of entry in the United States, and for immigrants it is the same. In 1907 over 70,000 were landed there, and over 95,000 persons passed the inspection of the immigration officials in that city. The present building is leased at a yearly rental of $3,748. It is a wooden structure, illy adapted to the purposes for which it is used, insanitary, and manifestly inadequate. It is a phyiscal impossibility to enlarge it, for every available inch of ground is now occupied. In 1907 there was collected at Boston in this immigration service $162,358. There are times when between 150 and 200 human souls are detained there, and the accommodations afforded are such at times as would draw down the indignant protest of any person of ordinary human instincts if applied to the caring for cattle, not to speak of the housing of human beings.

President Roosevelt's special investigator, James B. Reynolds, had this to say of the place some eighteen months ago after an inspection of it:

> Your detention pen (Boston immigration station) is an absolute fire trap, though it lodges from 100 to 200 people nightly in very crowded and cramped quarters. The sleeping accommodations are berths, one above another, such as are provided on board steamers, and such as may be excused there because of the limited space, but such as are provided on land only by the second and third rate lodging houses of the city. We are sometimes apt to criticise immigrants who reach our shores for their lack of cleanliness, though we are in no position to do so, seeing the accommodations we furnish them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the policy of the House has been defined upon this subject.

Philadelphia, which handled but 30,501 immigrants last year as against Boston's 70,000, was voted by the present Congress a $250,000 building, and consistency would prompt similar action upon the plea of Boston.

Now, so uncertain and chaotic are legislative conditions here that the House will, in all probability, adjourn without considering this matter, and for that reason I trust that action may be had upon it at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we heard the chairman of the Appropriation Committee argue forcibly to-day in favor of legislating into this bill a provision which would establish by law an office, the duties of the incumbent of which would be to inspect the style and character of furniture which shall go into new buildings. Surely, if the rule which my amendment offends is rendered powerless by the appeal of the chairman in such a cause, it ought not be invoked by him against my proposition, which affects not only the health, but safety and comfort of so many human beings. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is to be a resumption of good times, as predicted so frequently by the other side, then the inevitable result will be increased immigration and additional reasons for this station, and I urge the chairman of the committee not to press the point of order, but to allow this measure to pass on to law through the channels of the pending bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Joseph light-house depot, Michigan: For repairs to the dock and fences, $24,000.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 10, page 36, the following paragraph:

"The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and directed to accept as a gift from the owner or owners a piece of land 150 feet long by 100 feet wide, which shall be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor from a tract of land situated in section 23, town 4 south, range 19 west, Berrien County, Mich., and bounded on the west by Lake Michigan, on the south by the north pier at the entrance of St. Joseph and Benton Harbor, on the east by lands owned by the United States and occupied as a light-house station and light-house supply depot, and on the north by a line drawn westerly from the northwest corner of said lands occupied as a light-house station and light-house supply depot, parallel with said north pier at the entrance of said harbor, to Lake Michigan; and upon the delivery of a deed, with abstract showing good title to said tract of land offered as a gift in the United States, the Light-House Board is authorized and directed to erect the new light-keeper's dwelling heretofore authorized for said station on said tract of land so acquired."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DAWSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 30, 1908:

H. R. 15852. An act to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15219. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909;

H. R. 603. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 12773. An act granting to the city of Woodward, in the State of Oklahoma, lot 2, in block 48, for park and other public purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries of keepers of light-houses: For salaries, fuel, rations, rent of quarters where necessary, and all other necessary incidental expenses of not exceeding 1,650 light-house and fog-signal keepers and laborers attending other lights, $1,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making some observations on the pay of light-house keepers. I have had occasion to make application once or twice to the Department, and have always been met by the reply that the Light-House Board recognized the gross inadequacy of pay given to light-house keepers, but could make no increase on account of the inadequacy of the sum that was allowed them by the Committee on Appropriations. I have taken the pains to collect here very briefly the figures which show the life that can be led by the keeper of a light-house in the employ of this Government, charged with the duty of preserving the life of people and the interests of commerce. There is a light-house keeper about whom I know something who is paid the sum of $520 a year. Formerly he was required to light his house for eight months and a half in the year.

Now, on Lake Ontario he is obliged to keep the light for twelve months. This man has two children. The chairman of the committee may say that a light-house keeper has no business to have children, but children are approved by the President of the United States, if not by the Committee on Appropriations, and for the expenses of those he pays $200.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit an interruption?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman's criticism should have been addressed to the bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a short time ago, when that committee reported a bill to increase the compensation of light-house keepers. The salaries have been increased at this session.

Mr. ESCH. I will state that that bill only includes a ration of 30 cents a day.

Mr. TAWNEY. To light-house keepers?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; the other portion was stricken out.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will correct my statement. The bill I referred to was in relation to the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. PERKINS. The salaries are fixed by the Light-House Board.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are fixed by the Board under the limitation fixed by law.

Mr. PERKINS. But the limitation made by law is in the amount of the total appropriation, which makes it impossible for them to grant increases, which, as the Board themselves say, they are in favor of granting. This light-house keeper, for instance, has left for himself—for the board and clothes of himself and wife—out of the salary of $520 the sum of $125, or a little over $2 per week. That, under the compensation which can be allowed under the appropriation, is the total sum left for the board and the clothing of himself and wife during the year—a little over $2 a week—and on this sum it is impossible that a man and his wife should decently, not only properly and sufficiently, but decently exist.

Now, Mr. Chairman, only this afternoon——

Mr. TIRRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any other means of support?

Mr. PERKINS. This man has to be in this light-house, that is 6 miles from any town, on the remote part of the coast where it is situated. He must be in this light-house to see that the house is sufficiently warm, that the light is kept lighted. He gets what little can be raised on about an acre of land, but he has no other means of subsistence. Now, this very afternoon the committee thought it proper to allow a man, charged with the laborious duty of walking in for perhaps an hour a day and seeing the officials of the Secretary of the Treasury burn bills, $1,500 a year. A man who gives his whole life on a remote part of the coast, 5 or 6 miles from a village, 2 or 3 miles from any other house, who has to keep the light-house and the light in such shape that life may be saved, where any failure on any night of the year may result in loss of life or property, is paid $520, and has left for himself and wife, after he has sent his children to school, after he has paid for the expenses of a horse which he has to have to draw him to get supplies to take care of his children, a little over $2 a week, and it does not seem to me that these results are satisfactory or harmonious. [Applause.] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PRATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Erwin (Tenn.) station: Superintendent, $1,500; fish culturist, $900; three laborers, at $600 each; in all, $4,200.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell me, as a matter of information—because this is in my State—how many fish this establishment furnishes? I want to know because my people are very anxious to get more and better fish.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are so many millions that you can not compute them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I imagined that if there was any way to compute the matter the gentleman would know it.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no computation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they growing any fish there yet?

Mr. TAWNEY. In Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. At this fish-cultural station. Of course there are fish down there, in some places enough to lock and dam the river.

Mr. TAWNEY. They do not all stay at home.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have a great many inquiries—in fact, frequently—for more fish. If the gentleman will not give any information, I will presume that the fish-cultural establishment under the administration of my colleague [Mr. BROWNLOW] is doing its full duty.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of inquiry respecting food fishes: Assistant in charge, $2,700; assistant, $2,500; assistant, $1,600; two assistants, at $1,200 each; assistant, $900; assistant, $720; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, at $900; one clerk, $720; in all, $13,640.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order with reference to this section, because it seems to me that the provisions of the bill authorize much duplication of work. Here is an inquiry regarding food fishes, which has been going on for many years, $13,000. Immediately following is a further investigation as to methods of the fisheries, which has been going on for many years, $17,000. Two pages further on is an inquiry respecting food fishes, the same thing we have here, with an appropriation of $30,000. Then there is the following paragraph for collection and compilation of statistics of the fisheries, $7,500. There are four branches, all of which have been going on for many years, one of them in reference to the causes of the decrease in fisheries. Now, we all sympathize with all proper work of continuing the fish supply, but, on the other hand, it is entirely possible for different branches of inquiry to be instituted and never to terminate their inquiries, and it seems to me that it has been so in this bill. The four classes to which I have called the attention of the committee seem to me are duplications of work, and as none of them have any permanent authority of law, I wish, at least, to reserve the point of order to the paragraph just read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, there is no explanation that can be made other than to say there is no duplication under these several provisions. While this general heading of the four different paragraphs referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] may be similar in language, the work authorized and the work done with the money expended is altogether different in character. So far as the statute authorizing the work is concerned, the gentleman says there is no statute creating the Fish Commission or no statute clearly defining the purpose or the scope of its work; but it is a public work in progress. It has been going on for years, and these various appropriations that the gentleman has referred to have all been made in connection with the general work of the Commission. I sympathize with what he says, and it illustrates the difficulty of our ever getting rid of any Government service when we once inaugurate it. The Fish Commission is the outgrowth of a little innocent resolution passed in 1871, authorizing the appointment of a commission to investigate the cause of the depletion of food fishes and appropriating $5,000.

Mr. PERKINS. What year was that started in?

Mr. TAWNEY. I should have said in 1871.

Mr. PERKINS. Thirty-seven years ago?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; in 1871.

Mr. PERKINS. Have they yet found it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they have been investigating ever since. As I stated to the committee yesterday, one of our objections to the inauguration of the service that we were then discussing was the very fact that it would always grow upward and never downward, and the Fish Commission is perhaps as good an illustration of the truth of that statement as any other branch of the public service furnishes. It commenced in 1871, as I said, with a little resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to inquire into the cause of the depletion of food fishes, appropriating $5,000 for the service, and from that on it has grown, until the aggregate appropriation is almost $1,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Of course so far as these separate fisheries are concerned in which fish are bred for purposes of distribution, no one questions the utility of them, and if the expense is large the profit is also large. But when it comes to these inquiries as to what originally did cause diminution in the fish supply, certainly that should come to an end.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that these inquiries are inquiries that are absolutely essential, a part of and absolutely essential to the work of maintaining and carrying on the fish hatcheries. It is a part of the original work and is a work in progress. It has been going on these many years and will continue to go on for all time, I suppose.

Mr. PERKINS. Is there any information which the committee can furnish the Committee of the Whole as to what work, for instance, is covered by this appropriation, "Division of inquiry respecting food fishes?" What work is done under that?

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the language?

Mr. PERKINS. "Division of inquiry respecting food fishes."

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if he will take the hearings of two years ago of the subcommittee in preparation of the sundry civil bill at that time he will be able to find out. At that time the members of the subcommittee were all inexperienced in the preparation of the sundry civil bill, and had little or no knowledge regarding the various branches of the service provided in the sundry civil bill, and we went into the genesis of nearly all these various services, and I would respectfully refer the gentleman to the hearings of two years ago on the Fish Commission and the appropriation made under that title, and he will get all the information. I have not since that time given the matter any particular study as to the details of this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. My recollection is, however, that this is an inquiry that is a part of the general work, and especially the scientific work, of the various branches of the service.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill sufficiently familiar with this question so that he is willing to state that, in his opinion, there should be no reduction in the amount under these four different paragraphs to which I called his attention?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am; and I will say that I am sufficiently familiar also to state that the increase of $5,000 we gave in one of these appropriations is absolutely justified by the testimony, and that branch of the subject we went into rather minutely at this session, because it presented a new question, and that was in relation to the fresh-water mussels.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me right there to make a statement? I want to say, as a practical matter, in connection with the general subject of fish culture, that in my section of the country, on the Atlantic seaboard, there has recently been a great decrease in the supply of shad, and we regard this investigation, having for its purpose information as to the decrease of the shad in the rivers in my locality, as of the very utmost importance.

Mr. PERKINS. I think so, too; but does not the gentleman think that after they have spent thirty-four years in this matter there should have been some results?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In answer to that I will say it has been found that this decreased supply of fish in different localities in the country is constantly recurring, and that there are different causes which produce it, and from time to time the Fish Commission has investigated certain localities with a view of ascertaining the cause which decreased the supply.

Mr. TIRRELL. I wish to add, as showing that the subject has not yet been exhausted, that I have had pending until this session of Congress before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries a bill authorizing the Department to investigate and ascertain whether the so-called "dog fish" was a fish that could be used for food supply, and, if not, if some means should not be provided for its destruction.

Mr. BONYNGE. Why not try it on the dog? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Colorado has suggested that possibly if they would try the fish on the dog the gentleman could ascertain whether or not it would be a food fish. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Try the dog fish for sausage purposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PORTO RICAN FRANCHISE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with section 32 of an act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved April 12, 1900, I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the executive council of Porto Rico to the Puerto Rico Sugar Company, the Compañía Azucarera Central Machete, and to Messrs. Mullenhoff and Korber.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 1, 1908.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

DISEASES OF CATTLE.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 176, providing for the printing of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound 100,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle, the same to be first revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, 30,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 60,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the resolution be considered and passed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects.

JOHN PAUL JONES COMMEMORATIVE EXERCISES.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 19, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 19.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 25,000 additional copies of the addresses delivered at the exercises commemorative of John Paul Jones at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., April 24, 1906, together with other papers and illustrations germane thereto, compiled and published under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing; 8,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 16,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the House considering and agreeing to the resolution just read?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness in family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ASHBROOK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Frank S. Mathews (H. R. 19809), Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. GREENE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Wilson P. Strong (H. R. 21369), Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 145, nays 88, answered "present" 9, not voting 145, as follows:

YEAS—145.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 2, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the faithful brethren:

We do not cease to pray for you and to desire that ye might be filled with the spirit in all wisdom and understanding; that ye might walk worthily of the Lord, bearing fruit in every good work and increasing in the knowledge of God, strengthened with all power according to the might of His glory.

Let us pray.

Here is our prayer, Father, that what the apostle asked from Thee Thou wilt give to us to-day in this day's duty, in to-day's pleasure, in work, in thought, alone or together, that the Lord God will be with us to teach us, Father, Thy will; that we may walk worthy of this Christian vocation to which we are called; that it may not be in vain that Thou hast lifted this nation where it is, to be the messenger of Thy glad tidings to all men.

To-day, Father, we go back into the past to recall memories of the lives of those who have served in this Chamber, and to look forward for the good of this people. May every lesson of the past be translated for us into duties for to-day, to-morrow, and every day. O God, make this nation that happy people whose God is the Lord. We ask it, in Christ Jesus.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that House bill 20345, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, be taken up and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to page 2, line 16, the last paragraph read being the following:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Denmark, Morocco, Norway, Paraguay and Uruguay, Portugal, Roumania and Servia, and diplomatic agents in Bulgaria, Sweden, and Switzerland, at $10,000 each, $80,000.

Mr. HALE. The word "agents," in line 14, should be "agent." It is a mistake in the print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, strike out the word "agents" and insert the word "agent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 2, page 4, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Secretary of legation to Salvador and consul-general to San Salvador, $2,000; and the words "San Salvador" in the consular reorganization act of April 5, 1896, are hereby repealed.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 25, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "two thousand" and insert in lieu "thirty-five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to page 5, line 13.

Mr. HALE. In lines 12 and 13 the total should be changed so as to read "$129,875" in lieu of "$128,375." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in Schedule A, under the subhead "Transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts," on page 9, line 8, after the date "1909," to strike out "so much as may be needed" and insert "$30,000," so as to make the clause read:

To pay the cost of the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under the orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of 5 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, to continue available during the fiscal year 1909, $30,000.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1909, $4,800.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill state what this amendment relates to.

Mr. HALE. It is in reference to a conference arranged with the Department, under treaty, which takes place at Rome. The same provision was in the bill last year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 19, to insert:

REPORTS RELATIVE TO THE WORK OF THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

For the preparation of reports and material necessary to enable the Secretary of State to utilize and carry out the work partly performed by the Joint High Commission of 1898 for the settlement of questions relating to Canada and for the settlement of questions relating to Newfoundland, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to become immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. After line 4, on page 16, I move to insert:

Mr. HALE. I ask that this amendment may be passed over until after the reading of the bill has been completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 11, to insert:

The amendments were rejected.

The next amendment was, in schedule B, under the subhead "Salaries, consular service," on page 23, after line 6, to strike out "For salaries of consuls-general, consuls, and consular inspectors, as provided for in the act approved April 5, 1906, entitled 'An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States,' $1,061,000" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator who has charge of the bill the necessity of making an amendment in lines 13 and 14, because yesterday we agreed to the conference report on the consular reorganization bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate return to the item on page 19, beginning with line 4. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to insert on page 19, after line 3:

PURCHASE OF LEGATION PROPERTY.

For the purchase of building and grounds, or of a site and the erection of a building thereon, in the city of Paris, France, for the use of the embassy and for the residence of the ambassador at that capital, and for furnishing the same and, if necessary, otherwise adapting it to the needs of the service, $400,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will explain the amendment and the necessity for the expenditure of this extraordinary sum of money?

Mr. HALE. The item speaks for itself. It is a provision for buying property and owning a building for the use of the embassy of the United States in Paris. It was considered fully by the Committee on Foreign Relations and reported by that committee as an amendment to this bill, and in accordance with that report put upon the bill for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator. Why are we to have this building in Paris and not have one in Berlin and one in London, or is it to be the policy of the Government to own the houses where our ambassadors will live in other foreign countries than in France?

Mr. HALE. Of course the Senate will understand that this appropriation is a departure. The Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported it to the Committee on Appropriations, has all the papers and all the information upon it, and the members of that committee will give the details of the reasons why that committee adopted it.

It is the beginning of a new plan. In the East, where it has been impossible, in some cases, to rent buildings and where it was desirable because of conditions there to own property, we have heretofore had legation property owned by the Government. But we have never, up to this time, gone in as other governments have done and are doing in Washington and furnished residences for our embassies. The beginning of that plan, and it is involved in this amendment, was selected by the Committee on Foreign Relations as Paris, because, I suppose, it is very important as an embassy and there is property there which can be bought at a reasonable rate. Instead of going into others, although the Committee on Foreign Relations recommended one or two others, the Committee on Appropriations did not report anything except this provision for our embassy in France.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand, then, that this is the beginning of a policy to have such buildings in other countries.

Mr. HALE. Of course we can not tell what another Congress may do; but the reasons that apply for purchasing and owning and furnishing a residence for an embassy at Paris apply equally to London, Rome, Vienna; in fact, to all the great missions which are now embassies.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator if Germany and England own such magnificent establishments in this city as we propose to establish in Paris, costing some $400,000? The British embassy here is a very substantial-looking building, but I should think it could be bought for $150,000, and probably it would not cost that much. I think the French Government has lately bought a building here, but I do not think it cost $100,000 or $150,000. I do not know, and I simply make the inquiry for information.

Mr. HALE. All of those details are in possession of the Committee on Foreign Relations and will be given to the Senate if required.

At present the nations that we have friendly intercourse with, who have in late years purchased and built and furnished residences here, comprise Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, China, and, I think, one or two of the smaller powers. They have bought property here and built fine residence buildings and furnished them, and they house their ambassadors. That relieves them from the payment of rent.

Of course the great argument for it, and it is a very pertinent argument, is that if we furnish comfortable residences abroad, men can afford to take the places of ambassadors to foreign powers; it relieves them from the great burden under which they rest now of cutting into and in some cases absorbing their entire salaries.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think a poor man could live in a $400,000 house in Paris?

Mr. HALE. He could live better if he had a house furnished him than if he had to hire one.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he is a poor man, would he not rather live in a more humble residence, not put on so many airs, and not live in such magnificence?

Mr. HALE. I do not think if this property in Paris is purchased it will be considered in any way as extravagant there, or that it will in any way surpass what other nations furnish for their ambassadors in Paris. In fact, I think it would be rather a modest place compared with some other embassies in that great city.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator understands, of course, that it is not only the residence, but furnishing the offices and the location of the entire business part of the embassy, as well as the residence?

Mr. HALE. Yes; of course it is included. It is for all the uses of the embassy, not only the dwelling of the ambassador, but the offices in which the business of the embassy is transacted.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Maine has very frankly stated that this is the beginning of a new rule with respect to housing the ambassadors of the United States in foreign countries. I should like to ask him, in view of that candid statement, two questions.

The first is, Ought not the Senate and the other body to be allowed to consider this important and general question as to whether we shall institute this innovation on some general legislation, not in an appropriation bill? The second the Senator has adverted to already in a general way, but is there any special reason why we should at this time, under the peculiar circumstances which surround the Senate this morning, pass this appropriation for Paris, amounting to $400,000, without allowing the Senate an opportunity to consider the general questions to which I have referred? In other words, is there any special reason, on account of an option or anything of that kind, why we should act immediately upon the matter as to Paris and not act on the general proposition for all the countries?

Mr. HALE. It is a question purely for the discretion of the Senate. It will finally come, whether now or at some other time. But it is a question of the appropriation of money, and that should be upon this bill. It does not follow if Congress decides to inaugurate this plan by providing for Paris that it is obliged to take up the general question of providing for residences and offices for all the embassies. Like everything else the items will come up one at a time.

If this measure passes Congress and is embodied in this bill and the appropriation is made, undoubtedly next year the Committee on Foreign Relations, as it has done here, will call in the Secretary of State and have a full hearing, and if he recommends it to Congress, one or possibly two others will be reported, and it will all come up on an appropriation bill.

I do not think that in any way it weakens this project, whatever strength it may have, that we take only one at a time. It would be impossible to put through a general bill. There have been bills introduced perhaps in this branch of Congress, certainly in the other, for a general programme involving several million dollars, covering all of the embassies.

The Committee on Appropriations did not consider it proper and fitting at the present time to go further than to put this item upon the pending bill for Congress to settle whether it will begin in Paris. It is a good place. It is said that the amount is not extravagant, and from my knowledge of the situation, from the papers that have been presented and the illustrations of what the building is and what it will be, I do not think, if our ambassador gets this place and moves into it, it will be considered in Paris as in any way more showy, or as much so, as other great embassies which are established in that city.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if he is not of the opinion that if we buy one place we will have to buy more than one? Is it not certain that if we buy a building in Paris we must buy one in London or in Berlin or in other places?

Mr. HALE. I think they will all follow.

Mr. WARREN. Have we not already bought in Constantinople?

Mr. HALE. We have in the East, as I have already said, one or two cases where the conditions were such that for protection we have had to buy property.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. I understand that because of the conditions that is so in China and Japan.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator has concluded, I wish to say a word.

Mr. HALE. I admit that if we do this now, undoubtedly it is the beginning of the policy, and it will be followed up by requests from the Department from year to year to purchase property and to erect embassy buildings and offices in the other European capitals.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me just a moment to answer a question asked by the Senator from Texas, which the Senator from Maine did not cover?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the Senator from Texas, he made inquiry whether this ought to be settled now or at another time, and if there was any option. Of course I am not upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, and perhaps members of that committee had better answer the question; but I happened to be in Paris late last season. My attention was called to this property, not through the influence of anybody who sought to sell it to the United States or to buy it for the United States; but they took me to another property, which would cost several times as much and which would correspond more nearly with the embassies of Great Britain, Austria, and other countries.

But this building being then under repair, I had occasion to go through it and to go about it, making a pretty thorough examination. If we were to buy property, and surely we ought to do so, it seemed to me this would be good enough even though it were not worth a quarter or a fifth of what some other countries may have invested. I asked at the time as to the price, and it was stated that it would probably cost about $450,000.

I seems that the property belongs to heirs and that the time has come to divide it or divide the proceeds among the heirs. The property can now be bought at considerably less than $400,000, and it is considered by those who know the market prices of property in Paris as being very low, in consideration of the repairs which our ambassador has put upon the building—some thirty-odd thousand dollars of his own money—which, of course, he will never have returned to him. He has, however, on that account a sort of option on the property, and they will wait to see what Congress may do before the property is sold. But it is to be sold the present year.

Therefore I think, if we are to buy and furnish an embassy at Paris, this is the very best property, and I think it can be obtained for the least figure we can avail ourselves of at any time. Now, just a word more. As to the matter of policy, of course that is for every Senator to decide for himself. My own impression is that in Paris, where the whole world goes in and out—in fact, we have to go to Paris to get to almost any other country—we should not confine our embassy to upstairs rooms and back places, as it has been confined most often heretofore. I think we ought to have a place among nations, not equal, perhaps, to some others in elegance, but to have this Government represented in an official and permanent, even though modest way. I think we ought also to have——

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if other countries—Germany and England, for instance—own their embassies in Paris?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; magnificent ones.

Mr. OVERMAN. How do they compare with the property it is proposed this Government shall purchase?

Mr. WARREN. I should say that the English embassy is possibly worth five to eight times as much, and I should say that the Austrian embassy might be worth five to seven times as much.

Mr. LODGE. The English embassy is worth, I suppose, ten times as much.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly.

Mr. LODGE. The English embassy is one of the finest houses in Paris, and is surrounded with an immense garden. It is located right in the heart of Paris.

Mr. WARREN. The property in question here also has a garden. It faces two ways, and upon two prominent streets. It is very handsomely located.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is property more expensive in Paris than in Washington?

Mr. WARREN. It is; oh, yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Largely more expensive than it is in Washington?

Mr. WARREN. Very much more expensive.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose the British embassy here would cost not more than $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. Be that as it may, that property was bought when it was out of town and it cost then very little; but Paris—this property is in town and costs very much.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not criticise the character of this proposed purchase nor the cost of it. I think the only thing for us to determine is whether we are to go into the policy of furnishing buildings for our ambassadors and ministers at the several courts of the world. It is quite certain that if we purchase a building in Paris we shall have to purchase a building in London; and, having bought one there, we shall have to buy one in every great capital of every country of any consequence in the world.

Mr. President, I do not know but what we have reached a time in the history of the world when we may be compelled to do something of that kind. I have thought perhaps, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], that the matter ought properly to come to Congress in the way of determining what should be our policy, and not in the way of determining what should be done as to a particular embassy. I have no doubt that this purchase would be all right if we should determine that we wanted to make such a purchase; but, Mr. President, I want to say now that if we go into this business I am in favor of making a reasonable purchase. If we establish an embassy in a building of our own, we shall have to take some care to see, at least, that it is somewhat commensurate with our consequence in the world. We may let our minister or ambassador live where he wishes to, but when we provide a place for him we shall have to provide a good and proper one.

In addition to that, I have no doubt we shall have to do more than merely provide a building. If we provide a building which is large and somewhat prominently located, we shall have to equip it, to furnish it according to the character of the building and corresponding with the character of the position which our representative occupies.

Mr. HALE. That is provided for in the amendment, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that is provided for in the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The provision is "and for furnishing the same and, if necessary, otherwise adapting it to the needs of the service."

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I see.

Mr. HALE. That provision covers all of that.

Mr. WARREN. Just a word there——

Mr. TELLER. I think it follows, as a matter of course, that if we are going to provide a building we shall have to fit it up.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in my estimation, having seen both the properties—this house property and the legation where it is now located—this appropriation will cover its furnishing and upkeep. I do not think the expense will be any greater than it would be under our present system, under which the embassy is likely to be moving from place to place. There will be no greater cost for attendance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Let me just say one word before I sit down. The Government so far, to my knowledge, has never made an investment for an embassy or a legation but what the value of it has very greatly increased. This one is a good investment, and I think the property is one that will not deteriorate—that is, the land will be worth more, rather than less.

Mr. TELLER. That is not what I want to consider. I do not care anything about the value of this property. If it is a proper thing for us to do, we want to do it; and if it is not, we do not want to do it. If we go into this system, I think we ought to go into it with our eyes open and with the understanding that it is to add immensely to the cost of the diplomatic service in foreign lands. I do not mean to say that that is what we ought to do. If that matter is to be submitted to the Senate, I should like to consider it somewhat before I vote on it. We are now preparing practically to establish a precedent without any consideration whatever. We pay our ambassador to France $17,500 a year, as I recollect. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. TELLER. Now, with a house which costs $400,000 and properly equipped, our ambassador can not live for $17,500 a year, and we must make such provision, so that an ambassador who occupies a house that we shall buy and equip for him may be able to live in accordance with his surroundings. I do not know but what, in the present condition of the world, it is necessary that our ambassador should occupy a position somewhat different from what he has occupied heretofore. For instance, Mr. Franklin lived in a private house, and I believe his salary was $5,000 a year. Mr. Jefferson, I think, had a salary of $7,500, and he lived at a hotel. That, Mr. President, in those days was eminently proper and not out of character. Whether it would be so to-day is another question.

I suppose we owe something to the ideas of mankind, and since we have got to be a world power and are putting on fine airs, I think we shall have, perhaps, to enlarge our contributions in that line. I do not know how much it will cost to sustain a house of this character, never having lived in a house that cost $400,000, but I do know, Mr. President, that there will be considerable expense attached to a large house with large consequent demands. If our ambassadors in the future are to meet the demands which our present ambassador and our former ambassadors have had made upon them by society, then we shall have to make a very large appropriation either for their support or increase their salaries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I simply wanted to say to the Senator from Colorado that this house need not necessarily cost $400,000 or involve large expense in its maintenance. The dwelling in which our ambassador at Tokyo lives cost originally about $15,000, I understand, and its great value now is in the land.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is a very different thing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No. The grounds which surround the building are very valuable now—worth probably many times the original price; but it does not cost so much to keep the grounds up. I do not believe this house in Paris cost $400,000 to build.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The main value is in the land, I think.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the question. You will require a different character of house and you will have to meet different conditions in every way in Paris from those in Tokyo or some Chinese town. All I want to say about it is that when later on somebody raises a question about giving an additional appropriation for an ambassador or a minister and making some provision for maintaining his position socially, as it is properly demanded he shall, the Senate will not feel that they have a somewhat unnecessary demand on them. When we establish this principle we must establish it with the understanding that considerable expense is to follow.

We know, Mr. President, that there are certain demands made upon American ambassadors and ministers in all the great cities of the world. We recently had an intimation that the Emperor of Germany did not want a certain man because he would not expend as much money, and he would not have the social position because he did not expend it, as some other man had, who possibly might have been an inferior man to the one proposed. That is a part of his public duty, I suppose, and our representative abroad has got to do it.

I should have been glad if this matter could have come before the Senate in such a way as that the whole question could have been settled as to the adoption of the policy now proposed. As to whether we are really in a condition to make this movement, I have no doubt we are. If we purchase this property, I shall regard it as establishing a principle requiring us to furnish a house in practically each of the great cities of the world. If we establish an embassy in fine style in Paris, we must do the same thing in London, and we must do the same thing in every country of that rank at least.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I hesitate to ask the question because the Senator is not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations——

Mr. TELLER. No; I am not on that committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. But I should like to know if the Senator has any knowledge about what proportion, if any, of the cost of maintaining this character of establishment is borne by the United States?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, practically nothing heretofore, I suppose. We have been sending abroad rich men, who are able to pay for house rent two or three times the amount of their salary, and then they have been able to spend four or five times that amount in entertaining. It is not a very good condition when you can not send a man to represent the United States at Berlin, at Paris, or at London unless he is a millionaire; but that is the condition to-day. I do not suppose any man of moderate means would dare to take an appointment to any great capital to-day. If he did, he would probably be ostracized by the world's representatives.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TELLER. In a moment. There is something, undoubtedly, in the social relations and duties being properly performed by the representatives of this Government as they are performed by the representatives of other governments. I think we have passed the period when we can send a minister abroad and let him live in a small house or a small room, dress plainly, and fail to recognize the demands of society on him as the representative of this Government. I do not know that the world is any better by the change, but I think we have to recognize the fact that our ministers now are called upon to do things that they would not have been called upon to do a hundred years ago.

I only wish that we should start out with a knowledge of what it will involve if this thing is to be done. How much it will cost, I have not the slightest idea, but if we start upon it, I think, as we are a rich Government, we ought to do it in a proper style or else we ought not to do it at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, all I wanted was to ask the Senator from Colorado a question, and that was, whether he did not think it would add to the embarrassment of a man of even moderate fortune to assign him to a house worth $400,000, and whether the expense of administering that house and running it upon the social scale that would be required would not be such that it would be almost prohibitive of the employment of men of moderate means in positions of this kind?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in a house costing $400,000 and properly equipped, as such a house should be—for there must be some relation between the surroundings and the interior of the house—I do not believe that any man could go to Paris and live in such a house on $17,500 a year, even if he did not entertain at all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has put this question on the proper ground. The adoption of this amendment—and I hope it will be adopted—will be unquestionably the adoption of a policy. There can be no doubt about that. It was so intended. It was believed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, certainly, that it was wiser to enter upon the policy in that way by buying one house at a time as favorable opportunities offer than to attempt by an appropriation of five or six million dollars to enter on general purchases all over the world.

We own now legations at Peking; at Seoul, where the legation has been abolished; at Bangkok, Siam; at Tokyo, which is now an embassy of course; and two years ago we purchased another and very fine embassy building in Constantinople. This is a departure, in that it is providing for the purchase of an embassy in one of the great capitals of Europe. The change, I think, that has brought about the demand for a policy of this kind was when we created embassies and entered upon the appointment of ambassadors. When we created embassies we created posts of very much greater expense than any legation could possibly be. The rank of embassies was settled under the treaty of Vienna. An ambassador not only occupies a very much higher position than anyone else in the diplomatic service and has corresponding advantages in the transaction of business, but very great expenditures are forced upon him. Demands are made upon him that he can not well avoid. We changed the rank, and we made no change in the salaries. It would have been very much the same thing when we created the rank of Admiral in the United States Navy if we had simply given admirals the salaries paid to commodores.

Having given our ambassadors no increase of salary and thrown upon them a great increase of expense, we find ourselves confronted with the fact that, in order that the United States should have proper representation in those great capitals, we must either increase the salary or add to the salary by giving them house rent or confine these appointments to men of great wealth. What it has come down to is confining these appointments to men of great wealth in almost all instances.

It is impossible, practically, for an ambassador to live in a small apartment in Paris or Berlin and transact the business of the Government of the United States as it ought to be transacted. The demands do not come simply from the court or the society in which he finds himself, but the demands made by his own people are very great, indeed. They expect certain public receptions to be held on Washington's Birthday and on the Fourth of July; they expect hospitality from the ambassador. The number of Americans who go to these great capitals in Europe is very large; it is said that there are 60,000 Americans normally in London alone; and an ambassador can not escape the expenditure of a large amount of money. He has a constant pressure upon him; and a man who desires to represent his country properly is inevitably embarked in a course of expenditure which, if he is a poor man, will take probably what little property he may have. I know that that substantially happened in one case. It would not be proper to mention names, but I know that what I have just said did occur in one case.

Now, Mr. President, if we give to our ambassadors their rent, in addition to the salary they already have, it would certainly make living much easier for them; also it would give to the United States a definite place in the city; it would give the embassy a definite home, and it would establish what I consider a proper scale, because it is not merely that an ambassador is forced, if he is a poor man, to live below the scale that he would like to adopt, but there are cases I have in mind where men of great wealth have taken houses and established a scale of living which puts the successor in a position of great embarrassment. At least we should secure that the successive American ambassadors to any one country should live in the same house and should maintain substantially the same scale.

I do not think it is decent for a country as rich as the United States to send its ambassadors abroad as they are sent now, even if they have abundant money, to pass six months, a year, or eighteen months in looking for a suitable place to house themselves.

You have all heard the story of Mr. Choate and what he is reported to have said in a speech at a dinner. He said he wished to compliment the police of London; that on the night of his arrival in London it was very rainy. He was wandering about the streets and a policeman stopped him and said, "What are you doing here?" He said, "I am just wandering about the streets." The policeman said, "You must not do that; you must go home." "Why," said Mr. Choate, "I have no home; I am the American ambassador." [Laughter.] That is an exaggerated way of stating what is an actual fact.

I think I shall not be trespassing upon private confidences—because the fact is known to other Senators here, as well as myself—in saying that when Mr. White was appointed ambassador to Italy I happened to be in Rome, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] also happened to be there at that time. He had rooms at a hotel. He was searching for an apartment suitable for himself and his family to live in. It took him eight months to get a place where he could receive Americans and where he could transact the business of the embassy, and when he got a suitable apartment he was obliged, in order to make it fit for his purposes and for his residence, to spend something like $20,000 in putting it in order. Within one year he was transferred to Paris, and went from Rome to Paris, and the $20,000 he had the pleasure of spending on that apartment was of course an absolute loss to him.

I do not think it is fair to put these expenditures on our ambassadors, many of whom are not men of great wealth, but who desire to appear properly in the great office which they hold.

The really serious thing, to my mind, is that the inevitable tendency of this perfectly inadequate salary is to compel the giving of these offices exclusively to men of great wealth. The average man, even the man who has got a fair income of his own, knowing what expenditures these places require, does not want to go there and live in a "two-pair back." If he is going to represent his country at all, he wants to do it properly and generously and as it should be represented, and men decline those places because they can not face the great expense. I am speaking of embassies where very much is required. Therefore, Mr. President, I think this is a sound policy, one becoming to the United States, and one which we ought to adopt in regard to our embassies.

As for the amount of this particular purchase, I think, as the Senator from Colorado says, it is a secondary question. I know the particular house which it is proposed to purchase. I believe I have seen pictures of it. It is a very modest house, indeed, compared to the embassies of other nations in Paris; but you can not go into Paris and London any more than you can go into New York and buy a house suitable for an embassy, for official receptions and official purposes, for much under $400,000.

A little less than ten years ago we were offered for $300,000 the house in Rome then occupied by our ambassador, which was a very fine, modern house. It has a beautiful garden, and is a very fine house, indeed. There had been a great decline in values in Rome; real-estate speculation had been overdone, and this house was offered to our ambassador for $300,000. We talked it over in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and decided that it was useless to attempt to get an appropriation. So we allowed it to go by, and, within five years after that, the Government of Italy paid a million dollars for that same house and garden, and it is now occupied by the Queen Dowager of Italy. It was an opportunity to buy a very fine embassy, of which we ought to have availed ourselves.

I think, from the circumstances which have been stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and which are also known to him, that this is a good opportunity to buy a very suitable house—not an extravagant one—with an abundance of ground about it. It is an opportunity, if we are to enter upon this policy at all, which ought not to be allowed to go by; but the main thing with which I am concerned is the adoption of the policy. We must either largely increase the salaries or we must give them their house rent free, or we must expect to see these places occupied wholly by men of large wealth, and men of moderate means practically excluded from the great prizes of the diplomatic service. We have to make up our minds to just one of those three courses. I prefer the purchase of a house, because it seems to me that it is a great advantage to the United States to have one fixed place where the business of the United States shall be done and where everybody will know that the embassy of the United States is fixed and settled.

The rents which have been paid by our ambassadors have made great demands upon them, even where they have been men of moderate means and have lived in a way which every Senator in this body would agree was the only proper way for an ambassador of the United States to live. I have in mind one case in London, where the ambassador lived in a very simple manner, and yet his house rent in such a house as we should all expect him to have, and which nobody would comment upon as extravagant or unreasonable, the rent of that house took more than half his salary. It took $10,000 out of the $17,500 and left him with $7,500. He had other resources, or he could not possibly have occupied the place. I do not think that the rent which this house and grounds would represent is an excessive rent. I know that our ambassador to Paris has paid more than that in rent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask why is some particular house mentioned here? Is there an option on somebody's house in Paris? Does somebody want to sell a house to this country?

Mr. LODGE. That was explained by the Senator from Wyoming. This is an estate which must be settled within a year.

Mr. OVERMAN. Owned by some American?

Mr. LODGE. No; owned by a Frenchman. It is a French property. There is an opportunity to buy it on the settlement of an estate and to that extent it is a forced sale. They are holding it until the question can be decided here. I have no doubt about its being a good investment; and if we are disturbed about it, we can probably sell it for more than we give for it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to one statement of fact——

Mr. WARREN. Right there, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say that while this amendment does not confine the purchase to this particular property, it is expected we can buy it and that it will be a most advantageous purchase.

The property is now occupied by the American ambassador. He has expended some thirty-odd thousand dollars in putting it in thorough repair. He asks no relief, and this was not the property that he first suggested the United States should buy. But this opportunity has come, and the price will probably be nearer $350,000 than $400,000 for the house and land, where it has been held at $450,000. On account of the money expended upon it by our ambassador there is a sort of an understanding, which amounts practically to an option, that until Congress has passed upon it the United States shall have the right to buy it.

The value of this property is largely in the ground. As I said, it is between two prominent streets. There is a garden, and, as we all know, with the residences in Paris the garden is considered of equal or greater importance than the house. The entertainments that are given during most of the year are garden parties or receptions. They are the least expensive and the most satisfactory. The upkeep is not much. Probably the house alone would not cost over—or not much over—a hundred thousand dollars to build.

This is a very desirable property. It is one that furnishes office rooms, official quarters, and a family residence, and these fine grounds, of which the United States may well be proud. The ambassador and the great number of Americans who yearly visit there will have the full benefit of the grounds and the gardens, and the United States embassy be so located that we may take just pride in its permanency, convenience, and elegance.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to say one thing more. This is not extravagant, compared with other countries. England pays her ambassador to Paris £10,000 a year. In addition, she gives him one of the finest houses and most beautiful gardens in Paris. I think the English ambassador here receives £7,000, $35,000, and a house, stable, and grounds. But in Paris, where this is proposed, England pays her ambassador $50,000 a year and gives him a house and garden and everything free. That is the scale on which European nations transact their business abroad.

Under this amendment we are not confined to this particular property. It will be a very advantageous purchase, in my judgment, if we can get the property. But the amendment provides for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building, if that seems better to the judgment of the State Department.

Mr. President, I do not think I need dwell longer upon the subject. The arguments in favor of the amendment seem to me overwhelming, and the question seems to me to involve the dignity of the United States abroad. I think Senators understand it, and I do not desire to detain the Senate longer.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate for more than a few minutes, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said practically all that it is necessary to say, and it is not necessary that I should repeat it, except possibly to emphasize one or two points.

The only interest I have in making provision for embassies is the one which he has stated with great clearness, that the office of ambassador shall be open to any man of moderate means in this country, and shall not be exclusively confined to men of great wealth. This legislation is not in the interest of any ambassador who now holds a post in Europe, for the reason that all of them, possibly with one exception, are millionaires, and most of them are multimillionaires. If the question were left to-day to the wealthy men of the United States, at least to those of them who may have ambitions to hold such positions, whether there should be any change in the present arrangement, they would possibly most of them desire that there should be no change and that the law should remain as it is, because with the law as it is now they have an absolute monopoly of the representation of this Government in the high and important office of ambassador.

There is no trouble under present conditions so far as concerns the United States in getting ambassadors who will represent the Government. There are any number of wealthy men throughout the country who would be delighted to hold the office of ambassador and bear all the burdens, and not only all the existing burdens, but they would gladly serve if there was no salary at all. But as it now stands it is an utter impossibility for any man to hold one of these positions and present himself in a way that would be at all creditable to the country, leaving out of sight any suggestions as to snobbery or spectacular display, and which would not be mortifying to any of our citizens who should meet him, unless he is a man of great wealth.

Mr. President, the suggestion, while not made directly, is implied that this is not necessary and therefore it ought not to be done. In other words, that ambassadors can do their work in representing the United States and live in rented rooms or in cheap houses. We do not follow that rule in our expenditures in other matters. The Congress could be housed easily and comfortably in a building that would not cost over a hundred thousand dollars, and yet it would not comport with the dignity of this nation to have Congress in a building of that kind. We recognize the necessity of our having for the Capitol of this nation a building which shall be in harmony with the dignity of the country and in harmony with what is considered proper by other nations; and instead of Congress meeting in a building costing a hundred thousand dollars, we meet in one that has cost fourteen or fifteen million dollars. The same illustration pertains to all the other provisions which Congress makes for the proper accommodations of the Departments, and all of its business throughout the country.

We have here a public-building bill, and millions of dollars are expended where a few hundred thousand dollars would suffice if we were simply to be governed by the question of what is absolutely necessary. We could save a good many million dollars. It is not necessary that there should be these vast expenditures for public buildings if we were to limit it to such buildings as would just absolutely meet the necessities. But I do not think that would be a proper policy. I think the proper policy is to do as has just been done with respect to the city of Atlanta, where a million dollars has been appropriated for the erection of a public building.

It is proper it should be done. If we were to pursue the other policy, a hundred thousand dollars would furnish a proper building where the post-office business could be transacted and the courts held in Atlanta. But it would not be a proper thing to do.

In the same way, in my own city, a much smaller town, we are erecting a building to cost $300,000 for the post-office and court facilities and other offices connected with the Government. Twenty-five thousand dollars would put up a building in which the post-office business could be properly carried on and in which the court could be held, but it would be a disgrace to the Government of the United States to have such a building in such a city for such purposes, and it is a proper thing that the town has the $300,000 building. And so on throughout the country. The same illustrations could be made in almost every important city in the United States.

Senators will recognize the fact that the Government does not in its dealings in such matters control itself by a consideration of what is absolutely necessary, but it goes further and does what is proper and what is consistent with the dignity and importance of this nation. Mr. President, it is not necessary that we should provide buildings in the various cities in order that the Government shall be represented in style. It is represented in style now and will continue to be represented in style, even if we do not provide buildings. Even if we refuse to erect or provide proper buildings for the residences and offices of the ambassadors, there will be great buildings occupied by ambassadors, great spectacular displays, great ostentation, and there will be everything which will be on as grand a scale as we may desire on the part of the ambassadors of this country. That is the condition now. Because nobody will be ambassadors except these millionaires, and they will, at their own expense, continue to rent palaces and live in ostentation and splendor. But instead of its being so that any man who may have a moderate competency may, if he has the proper qualifications, represent this Government in these high and important positions, it will continue to be, as it is now, that they will be debarred, and only the millionaires can afford to be ambassadors. I do not recognize the correctness of the argument that it is consistent with democratic institutions that we should so parsimoniously arrange for our representation abroad that only a few favored men can hold these offices. That is the truth of the present situation.

Mr. President, when Mr. Franklin represented this Government in France, when Mr. Jefferson represented this Government in France, everything was upon a very different scale. It is true that was in the days of the old Confederation.

The salaries enjoyed by those distinguished gentlemen have been stated, but then Senators immediately thereafter were getting four or five dollars a day, and now they are getting over $20 a day.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is referring to the days of the Confederation. I have just been reminded that under the Confederation the house occupied by John Adams, who was our minister to the Low Countries, was owned by the United States.

Mr. BACON. I do not design to detain the Senate, although a great deal more can be said upon this line. I merely want to say one thing in regard to the expense in keeping up an extensive house. The expenditures are not proportioned, as might be thought, to the value of the house. The expenses of a gentleman in his home are practically the same, whether he is in a small house or a large house, so far as his private living is concerned. The size of the house for an ambassador is not that he may have so many living rooms, although he must have a proper number, but the large part of the house is necessarily devoted to public needs. It does not involve any great expense in keeping it up after the house is properly furnished, and so forth. But there must be large apartments for the receptions of the public, upon occasions when it is impossible, however simple and democratic our representative may desire to be, to avoid the reception of the public. And, aside from that, the large part of the value of a house in a great city is represented in the value of the land.

Another point I will briefly allude to is this: It is a difficult thing, by reason of the fact I have just mentioned, to get a house in one of these cities which is adapted to the uses of the representative of the Government. For instance, in the city of Paris, where our present ambassador has been for two years, while there are plenty of houses which would suit him as a private residence, it has been impossible for him to find a house which has such arrangements for public official entertainments and for the receptions of the public as would be at all suitable to the purposes; and after a year's effort he has succeeded in getting a house which, while it was sufficiently spacious, was dilapidated. There can be no higher evidence as to the difficulty of obtaining a suitable house than the fact that at last he had to get a house that was so dilapidated that he had to spend $30,000 in putting it in such reasonable repair as to enable him to receive in that house the representatives of other governments and the large colony of Americans who are in Paris and the large number of American tourists who annually visit there.

The question, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] indicates that he has not accurately informed himself as to the provisions of this proposed appropriation. It is not $400,000 for a house, and after that is to follow an appropriation for equipment, but the amount named here covers everything.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that.

Mr. BACON. I then misunderstood the Senator. I understood the Senator to indicate that after the house was purchased there would have to be an additional expenditure for equipment. I am glad to know that I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. This bill contains an appropriation not only for the purchase of the house, but for its equipment.

Mr. BACON. And furniture.

Mr. TELLER. Yes. The house may cost $400,000.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. TELLER. I think the appropriation would justify the purchase of a house to cost $400,000.

Mr. BACON. I think not. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CULLOM. No particular property is mentioned in the bill.

Mr. BACON. No property is mentioned in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I understand there is no specific property named, and they can go out and pay $400,000 or $395,000 and have $5,000 or $2,000 or $1,000 left. I am not finding fault with that. I do not know that you can do any better. If we are going to buy a house, I want the Government to buy one consistent with our standing and our wealth. I do not think $400,000 is an immense sum for a house in Paris.

I only want to have it understood that we are entering upon a policy which will require us not only to buy houses for our foreign representatives, but to equip them; for if we do, in my judgment—I am confident it will be found to be true—we will be compelled either to increase the salaries or else to provide sufficiently for the support of the ministers, as we provide for the support of the White House.

Mr. BACON. It is not simply Paris. The only reason we take one place and limit our recommendation to that now is because it is more easy to accomplish something in that way than it would be to try to do it all at once. But it does seem to be very remarkable that Senators should be unwilling to go to an expense of this kind when large sums of money are voted here for other purposes with comparatively little consideration. Here is the agricultural appropriation bill, which we have had under consideration, in which there is an appropriation of over $3,000,000 for the service connected with forestry, and we are told that that expenditure is to be made for purposes in the nature of improvements and things of that kind. Three million dollars. And yet the Senate is content, when that $3,000,000 appropriation is under consideration, with the simple statement that most of it will be used for permanent edifices and things of that kind for the protection of the forests, and nobody asks for details. The same amount will furnish embassies for the American ambassadors in all the principal countries in Europe. The money will not be lost, but the property will belong to the United States and increase in value, whereas you will never again hear of the $3,000,000 you spend on the forest reserves. Yet the latter is freely voted without any details.

Now, in regard to what other nations do, there is not a government which has not in Paris a building worth a great deal more than this one would cost, and many times more. In this city, where property is not worth one-fifth of what it is in Paris, the French Government is now proceeding to erect an embassy, and it has already voted $250,000 for it, and the purpose is to spend a million dollars for a proper and suitable embassy.

Mr. TELLER. So far I have heard nobody complain of the price of the building. The only question is whether we want to enter upon this policy.

Mr. BACON. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. If we do want to enter upon the policy, I do not suppose anyone will question the price of the property.

Mr. BACON. If it is simply a matter of policy, then, as a policy, we ought to make arrangements by which every ambassador, when he goes to a foreign capital, will be able to live in the same state that his predecessor lived, and have the posts open to men of all gradations of wealth and not simply open to a few multimillionaires.

If the amount stated in this amendment is too large, then reduce it to a proper amount. What I am concerned about is that we shall determine what kind of embassies we shall have at the European capitals, and that when we have so determined we shall provide them and require our ambassadors to live in them, so that all of our ambassadors may appear upon an equal footing. I am not willing that one ambassador shall, because he is a millionaire, live in a royal palace, and have his successor at the same post, because he is a poor man, live in a mean house which will painfully contrast with the palace which was occupied by his predecessor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, at the outset of the consideration of this bill—it has not been considered more than an hour—I suggested, and the suggestion met the approbation of the distinguished Senator from Colorado, that in instituting an entire change of policy on the part of the Government, from renting embassies to purchasing them, there ought to be at least a general consideration of the subject.

I call attention to the fact that there is not a fourth of the Senators on the floor while this bill is being considered.

Mr. BACON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Texas has suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to state it was not my purpose to suggest the absence of a quorum in the parliamentary sense of the term.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did it, nevertheless.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is out of order. The absence of a quorum has been suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

PRESENT.

Allison	Clay	Hale	Richardson
Ankeny	Crane	Hemenway	Scott
Bacon	Culberson	Hopkins	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Cullom	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Beveridge	Daniel	Long	Smoot
Bourne	Depew	McLaurin	Stephenson
Brandegee	Dick	Milton	Stone
Brown	Dillingham	Money	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Dixon	Nelson	Taliaferro
Burkett	Flint	Newlands	Taylor
Burrows	Foster	Owen	Teller
Carter	Frye	Overman	Warren
Clapp	Fulton	Paynter	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger	Perkins
Clarke, Ark.	Guggenheim	Piles

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, when the call of the roll was directed by the Presiding Officer I was stating that at the outset of the consideration of this matter I made a suggestion that there ought to be fuller consideration of this question before we entered upon this change of policy. There being a disposition to vote upon the matter without, as it seems to me, such a consideration as I think it deserves, I raise the point of order that the appropriation is out of order under this provision of Rule XVI:

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment, I think, is clearly in order under the first clause of the rule:

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation—

Which is this case—

unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

The amendment is moved by direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, as the next paragraph of the rule requires, more than twenty-four hours before the bill was reported.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit the point of order to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment is not in contravention of the provision in the first clause of Rule XVI, cited by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and for that reason overrules the point of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit that the amendment is in contravention of the third paragraph of Rule XVI:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think this is clearly not general legislation. It is a new item of expenditure, germane to the bill. The very next amendment to it, providing for the purchase of a legation building at Tokyo, was adopted by the Senate, and very properly. This amendment contains an item of appropriation for the purposes of the bill. It is a new item.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment does propose legislation in the nature of general legislation, and that it is obnoxious to paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, quoted by the Senator from Texas. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

No objection has been made to the item providing for the purchase of the legation building at Tokyo.

Mr. HALE. Now, I think there is nothing further in the bill to bring to the attention of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATORS FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I ask for the consideration of the resolutions I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida submits resolutions, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the deaths of the honorables STEPHEN R. MALLORY and WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, late Senators from the State of Florida.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable their associates to pay proper tribute to their high characters and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the families of the deceased Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, the late distinguished Senator, STEPHEN R. MALLORY, of Florida, died at Pensacola, his home, on Monday morning, December 23, 1907, in the sixtieth year of his age. He was born in Columbia, S. C., November 2, 1848, but very soon thereafter was taken by his mother to Key West, Fla., where his boyhood days were spent. In the fall of 1864, when only 16 years old, he entered the Confederate army, but after a brief service, or in 1865, was transferred to the Navy, serving as a midshipman on the Patrick Henry until the war ended.

Soon after the surrender, or in November, 1865, he entered Georgetown College, District of Columbia, and graduated therefrom in June, 1869. The fortunes of the family having been sapped by the four years' struggle, he had to bend his efforts of body and mind to the serious affairs of life, and, having made a fine record in college, he applied for and obtained a chair in his alma mater and taught there for two years. In June, 1904, this institution conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws. The hours not filled by his duties at college were diligently spent in preparing himself for the practice of law. Later he removed to New Orleans and, while still reading law, supported himself by teaching school. In 1873 he was admitted to the supreme court of Louisiana and in 1874 removed to Pensacola and began practice.

From his early life he took an active interest in government and politics, and especially in the herculean struggle being made to free Florida from the corrupt control of political adventurers. In 1876 he was elected, as a Democrat, to the lower house of the Florida legislature; was elected to the State senate in 1880 and reelected in 1884, his services covering in all a period of ten years. His record was excellent in every way and inspired his people with such confidence in his integrity and ability that he was sent to represent his district in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses.

In 1897 the Florida legislature balloted many days for many men for United States Senator in one of the most exciting contests of the history of the State and finally elected Senator MALLORY to succeed the Hon. Wilkinson Call. He was actually not a contestant for the place, but believed that the honor would go to one of the declared candidates then in the field. Indeed, it is said that he had no notice of any purpose to propose his name earlier than twenty-four hours before his election.

Senator MALLORY's career in this body shows him to have been a careful thinker and a conservative statesman. He was not opposed to reform, but first satisfied himself that a change was needed and that the new order would be better than the old. He thought that the basic principles of this Government were sound; his respect for the Constitution was profound, and his abiding faith was that through the study of the Constitution the broadest and best principles of government could be learned. In his will he left a sum to Georgetown University to be invested and the proceeds used to provide medals to be awarded from time to time for the best essays upon the Constitution of the United States.

Senator MALLORY's mind was essentially judicial and his sense of justice true and correct. He was of the Catholic faith and loved his church, but I submitted a case to him once in which the church was largely interested, and, after giving it careful study and thought, he decided that the contention of the church, while possibly correct in equity, had no standing in the law.

While he was grateful to those who had brought about his election to the Senate from the deadlock of the Florida legislature in 1897 and loyal to the men who led in that contest, yet his gratitude and loyalty were not allowed to extend beyond the bounds of what a correct conscience told him was right. In his first term in this great deliberative body Senator MALLORY made an excellent record, and upon the strength of it had no opposition for a second term, his election by the legislature in April, 1903, being unanimous.

I had known Senator MALLORY as a lawyer in Florida, as a member of the legislature, and as a Representative in Congress, but my home was in Jacksonville and his in Pensacola, cities wide apart, and because of the infrequency of our meetings our acquaintance was only casual. In 1899 I came to the Senate, and it was then that our real acquaintance began. The sturdy excellence of the man caused me to admire and esteem him, and I was soon glad to number him among my strong and steadfast friends. It is largely upon the intimacy with him here in this body that I base my views and judgment of his character.

He was the son of a distinguished man, but this did not spoil him or cause him to seek prominence or adulation. He fought his own fight with a definiteness of purpose that was commendable and showed the sterling stuff of which he was made. He attained, but the honors he won were worn with touching modesty. His career shows steadfastness of character and purity of principle. His record here—in all his life, indeed—displays a patriotic and abiding faith in the principles of our Government, a correct sense of justice, and a deep and generous sympathy for those who struggle for the betterment of themselves and their children. He believed that the foundation of a wise and enduring Government was the education of its people, and if there was one cause more than another which appealed to his sympathy and enthusiasm it was education.

Child-labor legislation, compulsory education, the organization of the public school system of Florida, and the reorganization of school matters in this city all bear the impress of his zeal in behalf of thousands of children whom he could never know. But the children whose pitiful condition touched him most closely were those in the naval reservation off Pensacola, in sight of his own home. There were 500 or more of these children, many of them descendants of workmen who were long ago induced to go there under the promise of homes in peaceful security. The State had no jurisdiction or control of this reservation, and therefore no power or authority to supply schools, and the children were growing up in comparative ignorance. The first Congressional provision for their relief was introduced by Senator (then Representative) MALLORY. Since then he worked untiringly in every Congress of which he was a member for free school facilities for these children. In the Fifty-ninth Congress he introduced a bill in the Senate for the establishment and maintenance of public schools on the naval reservation. Finally, certain, because of his fast failing health, that he could not live long, he arranged for a place on the Committee on Naval Affairs (exchanging with his old friend, Senator Blackburn, who went to the Committee on the District of Columbia), one of his purposes being to further the educational interests of the neglected children of the Pensacola Navy-Yard.

Entering the portals of death, a soul whose life labors were dedicated even in part to the betterment of the condition of little children need have no fear.

A friend of Senator MALLORY, a friend of education, and especially of neglected children of the naval reservation, has suggested that no more enduring monument could be erected to his memory, no more fitting tribute of love and veneration could be laid upon his grave, than for this great body to assume the work of providing the little neglected protégés of the nation with the educational advantages which should be assured to all.

Senator MALLORY was the son of Stephen Russell Mallory, who was a Senator from the State of Florida in this body from 1851 to 1861, when he retired to follow the fortunes of his State, which had seceded from the Union to become a part of the Confederate States of America. The elder Mallory was secretary of the Confederate navy, which placed upon the seas the first fighting ironclad the world had ever seen—an ironclad which ended the era of the wooden vessel and revolutionized the naval architecture of the world.

The elder Mallory was born in Trinidad on his father's vessel, sailing from Bridgeport, Conn., famed as the home of mariners and shipbuilders. The junior MALLORY also was reared within the sound of the sea. Indeed, his early boyhood days were spent at Key West, an island in the sea, some miles distant from the mainland of Florida. Reared in such an atmosphere and descended from the sturdy mariner folk of Connecticut, it is but natural that he should love the sea, its vast air of freedom, the grandeur of its storms, the music of its murmurs, and its mysteries. The Spanish blood in his veins, a heritage from his mother, produced in him, as the strange chemistry of the Latin admixture usually produces, a perhaps more intense love of the beautiful in poetry and art and nature than the Anglo-Saxon seems to hold, and especially in nature, which he looked upon as the open book—the ideal—of both poetry and art.

For many years preceding his death Senator MALLORY had been an invalid. During much of that time he was compelled to rest in a sitting posture. He bore his troubles silently and without complaint even to his most intimate friends. He has appeared in this body more than once with the tell-tale flush of fever on his face and suffering bodily pain to participate in some important debate or to advocate some measure of interest to the people of his State and the nation. Nor did he measure the sum of his duty by the interests of his State alone.

When he came to die the Senate was sent a message—one of his last—requesting that there be no official funeral. He wished no pomp or display, but merely to be laid quietly away by his own people at his own home with the simple service of the Catholic prayers for the dead. He asked too that there be no eulogy, but Father Fullerton, who conducted the funeral, felt "that a life so modest, so full of lessons for the living, warranted a disregard of part of this request at least." He said that Senator MALLORY "had died as he had lived, a courageous man, religious without pretense, and a faithful soldier of the cross. There was no complaining or repining in the long fight against sufferings which were a martyrdom. He showed us how to live, and when he could not longer show us that, he showed us how to die."

On the north face of the Confederate monument at Pensacola there is a legend selected by Senator MALLORY and chosen perhaps because it was the lode star of his own life:

"Tis not in mortals to command success. We'll do more, Sempronius—we'll deserve it.

And I may add, Mr. President, that the success which my lamented colleague achieved he well deserved.

Mr. MILTON. Mr. President, the electric spark never flashed a more grievous message to the people of this country than that sorrowful announcement that went over the wires on the 22d of last March that the noble heart of WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN had ceased to beat forever.

I confess, sir, at the outset, my inability to do justice to the character and merits and achievements of this extraordinary young man who so lately sat among you, a resplendent figure, superbly endowed by nature with all the charms of a fine physical presence and with an intellectuality of the highest order. Ever since his mortal remains were laid to rest I have carried with me each hour of the day the most poignant sense of bereavement and acute sorrow that accompanies the loss of a dear personal friend, and beyond that the knowledge of the affliction that has come to the people of his State and mine, in the passing of one who had but stepped upon the threshold of a career that would unquestionably have brought him lasting fame, as it would have resulted in good to his State and country.

A youthful giant, he was cut down by an inexorable destiny in the blossom time of his existence, ere yet the perfect fruit had come to maturity. The youngest Senator save one who ever occupied a seat in this Chamber, I do not conceive it to be the language of exaggeration that proclaims him to have been the greatest man of his years that this generation has been privileged to know. The heights he would have reached had his life been spared can only be surmised, but those of us who knew him best and had followed his developing genius from the days of his boyhood are confident that his fame would have ultimately filled the continent and that he would have left an imperishable record on the pages of his country's history.

Mr. BRYAN made no claim to high patrician lineage or aristocratic ancestry, and yet he was of no plebeian origin. His father, Hon. John M. Bryan, now living at an advanced age, is a Floridian by birth, and for many years has been one of the most useful and honored citizens of the State. Conscientious, high-minded, and full of zeal, he prompted the welfare of his native Commonwealth. The sire instilled into the plastic mind of his son at a tender age those elementary principles and honorable aspirations which were so magnificently developed in him we mourn. Born in Orange County, Fla., October 10, 1876, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN passed much of his boyhood days in the open air, acquiring a fine physique in the work of a farmer boy. He learned fruit culture and breeding of cattle, and the practical knowledge thus acquired was of much service in his subsequent career.

After finishing his course at the local high school, he entered Emory College, at Oxford, Ga., and was graduated from this noted institution with honor. Still later, he pursued his studies at Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va., where he ranked among the most earnest and successful students, taking his degree in June, 1899.

His next step was the carrying out of his long-cherished ambition to take up the practice of the law as his regular life work. Admirably equipped for this exacting and greatest of all professions, his success was so immediate and conspicuous at the bar of the metropolis of the State that in 1902, three years after leaving the university, he was overwhelmingly elected to the office of county solicitor. From that time on his progress was rapid and brilliant. Still youthful to the point of boyishness, he met the veterans of the bar on equal terms, asking no odds, and winning battle after battle in lawsuits of the highest importance, until he became recognized from one end of the State to the other as one of the shining lights in his profession. He went into the trial of a case only after the most thorough preparation, studying it in every phase, with the diligence of his old student days. In addition to the mastery of detail, he possessed the gift of eloquence, and the personal magnetism that appealed to juries with irresistible force. With such an equipment, it is no wonder that in the few years of his practice he attained a prestige any man might be proud of acquiring in the course of an ordinary lifetime. His older associates were astonished at the scope and profundity of his legal attainments, and at the skill he displayed in the handling of every case. To sum up, he was a lawyer of the first rank, ever loyal to the interests of his clients, and scrupulously honorable in and out of the court room. This quality endeared him to his legal brethren, as it did to the public at large.

Neither as a private citizen, a professional man, nor the holder of an office, was the integrity of his conduct, or the purity of his motives ever brought into question. He was likewise as magnanimous as he was honest, ever willing to concede honor to all who deserved it, and never making unreasonable demands for personal aggrandizement.

It was inevitable, however, that a man of his temperament and qualifications should be drawn into the political arena. Seemingly born to assume a leadership of men, he plunged into the memorable Broward-Davis gubernatorial campaign, ranging himself with the forces that followed the banner of the successful candidate. Following this, he was, in 1904, a candidate for delegate at large to the national Democratic convention, with the result that he was chosen by the largest vote given any man on the ticket. This lead of more than 1,000 votes was the spontaneous tribute of the masses of Florida's Democratic voters, who believed in this young chieftain for their cause and in the attainment by him of a splendid destiny. He was even then the hero of his people.

On the day when he was notified of his appointment to succeed the late Senator STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY, Mr. BRYAN issued the ringing public statement from which I take the following extracts, as showing the virile qualities of his intellect and the buoyant optimism of his nature. Among other things, he said:

> From among those who are candidates for the nomination of United States Senator, I believe that he should be chosen who can best serve the people of Florida in crystallizing their Democratic faith into national law. It is purely a question of service. That Democrat can render the best service who is really and sincerely in heart and mind in accord with the principles and beliefs of the rank and file of Florida's Democracy and has been so in season and out, whether a candidate, a private citizen, a public official, a lawyer, doctor, editor, farmer, or what not, regardless of his local habitation. * * * I am, by birth, education, and intense conviction, identified with the State of Florida, and hope to contribute of the strength of vigorous manhood and an unflinching courage of a firm believer in the righteousness of his conduct to the State in which my people, having been of pioneer families in the period of settlement and development, so wholly belong. I shall accept the Governor's commission, and I propose to justify his action in the minds of all fair-minded Democrats by an earnest, energetic, and unflagging devotion to the interests of the people of Florida. * * * I have planned a whirlwind campaign already, that will give courage to my friends in the coming primary election.

In this very human and positive announcement the gallant spirit of BRYAN makes itself felt. It was like the man—earnest, straightforward, devoid of all guile and pretense. He took the people into his confidence, and there was never a time in which they did not trust him implicitly. He said he had planned a whirlwind campaign. There are few who do not believe that he would have been successful by the verdict of the people had he lived to carry through his fight for a full Senatorial term. Although he was contending against able and popular men, in his own mind there never came a shadow of doubt of his triumph. As with many of his type of inherent greatness, he was a firm believer in his own destiny. But let it be understood that this conviction had no effect whatever on the natural sweetness of his disposition or upon the amiability of his bearing.

He was always the courteous, unaffected gentleman, ever considerate, never arrogant, never vain or conceited. His appearance here might well have turned the head of a man of less balance, for it was a proud distinction that he enjoyed to be seated among men of national repute, most of whom were so greatly his seniors. Yet he took his place with that modest, serene air which sat so well upon him and which stamped him as one of nature's noblemen. The favorable reception which he met, and the kindliness shown him by every Senator on both sides of this Chamber, would have been a precious memory throughout all the years of his earthly pilgrimage. Not only did he win the instant favor of his associates in this body, but the most cordial and sympathetic relations were established between him and the leading officials of the Government, including the Chief Executive of the United States. Upon their first meeting the President of the United States recognized the young Southerner's innate nobility of character, his high purpose, and chivalrous principles, and immediately they became friends. Evidence of this was seen in the beautiful compliment paid by President Roosevelt to Mr. BRYAN'S memory, when in accordance with the latter's wish he decreed that one of the new battle ships should bear the name of Florida. How pathetic it was that he who was instrumental in bringing this about could not have lived to see the bestowal of the name on the occasion of the great ship's christening.

After all, Mr. President, perhaps WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN did not live so short a life, when we come to consider how full of action were his days, how crowded with worthy deeds, how much of good he wrought, and what a deep imprint he made on the history of his time. The record that he left will endure, and for generations to come it will serve as an inspiration and a stimulus to other young men of the Southland.

In speaking of his capacity for deep study and investigation and of his profession and boyhood I have but barely alluded to his engaging qualities as a man or of his irreproachable conduct as a husband, son, and brother. In the long days of illness that preceded his departure from life he was sustained by the presence of the devoted woman upon whom he lavished the utmost affection of his knightly soul and that of the loyal brother, who was also his truest friend. But outside of his family circle he drew to him a multitude of men, from the humblest to the highest, for he took as keen an interest in the welfare of the poorest farmer as in that of the most influential and aristocratic of his compeers, for, with the great poet of Scotland, he believed that "A man's a man for a' that," and he never knew how to "bend the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow fawning."

He did not court the favor of the rich and the great, but always he stood forth as the champion of the rights of the people. However, there was no taint of the demagogue or the political charlatan. He took no stock in the doctrines of the radical or the Socialist, and his programme was conservative, not revolutionary. He prosecuted a trust with vigor and to successful conclusion, not pandering to public prejudice but to avenge a violated law. There was naught of malice in his temperament, but he believed that laws were made to be enforced and that the violators of laws should be punished.

That the world is better because WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN lived in it there can not be a doubt. He did not burst upon our vision like a blazing comet, attracting all eyes by the strangeness of its advent and luster of its fire; instead, he rose like a star, moved steadily in his appointed orbit, and melted off into the light of heaven.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a singularly conscientious and devoted public man of the very best American type has been lost to the Senate and the nation in the death of STEPHEN R. MALLORY, of Florida. His splendid character was manifest in the very aspect of his face and form—in the refinement of his well-remembered features and the dignified and courteous bearing of the well-born, cultivated gentleman. He was a worthy heir to one of the historic names of the South, the second of his family to adorn this Chamber. This is a distinction rare in the annals of the Republic. Not often in our bustling, aggressive democracy are the public honors of a father transmitted to a son—nor were these honors in this instance merely transmitted as a matter of right, in the aristocratic Old World way, from the older to the younger MALLORY. Rather were they achieved anew by the younger man, in our good American way, by dint of sheer ability, ardent endeavor, and high personal deserving. Fortunate is he who inherits a distinguished name, but still more fortunate is he who, inheriting it, leaves that name all the more illustrious because of the manner in which he has borne it throughout his life and of honest and beneficent work in the service of his country.

It was the fortune of Senator MALLORY to have lived during the most stirring and dramatic period of our national career. These are the years spanned by the lives of the majority of the older men now in this Chamber. As a lad he saw the final intensifying of the sad and bitter estrangement between North and South, that consummate tragedy of America, the transforming of brethren into deadly enemies—a tragedy which we are mourning still, but, fortunately, one which heals and fades so swiftly in these present years that to our children's children it will be a thing incredible.

Young MALLORY not only saw this tragedy. Like tens of thousands of brave and ardent boys, South and North, he was himself a part of it—both witness and actor in its heroism, grief, and suffering. As a young officer of the Confederate navy he bore his share in the final scenes of the drama, and it happened that his own rôle was of the most difficult and discouraging character. It is a matter of history that the little, improvised Confederate fleet was outmatched almost everywhere by the overwhelming resources of the Federal Navy, and that it was only the solitary commerce destroyers, free and far on the ocean, some of which never saw Confederate waters, that could make any headway against the tremendous maritime power of the North. Yet peculiarly hard and disheartening as was the service of the Confederate navy in the work of home defense, it proved to young MALLORY to be an admirable school of manly courage and endurance. What is more, it helped to give him that unusual interest in and knowledge of the affairs of the sea which, strengthened by his long residence at a historic Southern seaport, made him so useful afterwards in House and Senate in the consideration of important matters of ocean trade and navigation. On all these things he spoke among us here with rare information and authority.

But Senator MALLORY was a well-rounded man. Nothing of concern to the nation or his State found him indifferent or forgetful. The great war had broken in upon his school years, as it broke in upon the student life of so many of the wisest and best men who have sat here and in the other House of Congress. But when there was opportunity he turned again resolutely to his education and gathered an excellent equipment in the law. His habit of mind was exact, logical, and fair. He would have made a great and able judge. Indeed, his temperament was naturally the broad and philosophical one of judge and arbiter rather than of sharp, uncompromising partisan advocate. But his honored name, the ripeness of his scholarship, and his notably attractive personality marked him out for an active political career. The people of Florida were proud of his qualities of mind and heart, and proud of the distinction of being represented by a man like this at Washington.

Senator MALLORY in his later day and generation recalled some of the best traditions of those earlier and fortunate years before the slavery feud had rent North and South asunder. He was of a distinguished race, long identified with the most important public service. The power of leadership and of statesmanship were with such men a matter of instinctive habit and inheritance. They knew their people and were absolutely trusted by their people, and they held to lofty ideals of the obligations and the powers of government. Even those who differed with them never dreamed of doubting the sincerity of their logical conclusions and their disinterestedness of purpose.

Senator MALLORY endeavored, in his long and valuable public service here in Washington, to approach every public question with entire openness of mind. His manner of discussion was always candid and philosophical. He respected his honest adversaries and commanded respect from them. He was one of those rare public servants who could be both fair and firm—for beneath his kindliness and courtesy there was always manifest the bed rock of deep and strong individual conviction.

Out of many years of pleasant associations with Senator MALLORY in the general service of the Senate, I can not but recall especially the most faithful and considerate performance of his duties a few years ago as a member of the Merchant Marine Commission. This was a difficult and thankless labor, involving as it did much journeying and long and weary sessions in the heat of summer and the crowded year of a Presidential campaign. Senator MALLORY was not at that time in robust health. The additional duties of the work of the Commission were sure to prove a severe tax upon his physical strength and to rob him of a well-earned and needed leisure. Yet, instinctively recognizing that his own personal knowledge of maritime conditions made his presence and participation of the utmost value, he loyally undertook the task, traveling, studying, and laboring to the very limit of his physical capacity, personally arranging for and presiding over several of the Commission's sessions of inquiry in the far South, and aiding materially in the final drawing up of the recommendations of the Commission to Congress. On every point where he could consistently agree with his Republican colleagues Senator MALLORY fully and unhesitatingly agreed, just as on other points he firmly and courteously differed.

But he made it his business to seek points of agreement rather than of disagreement, and if this question of our merchant marine, long such a contentious and almost hopeless question in the American Congress, is now, as I believe, somewhat further along toward a fair, friendly, and satisfactory solution, the credit for it must be held to be in a large measure due to the untiring industry, the breadth of temper, and the devoted patriotism of my good friend and keenly missed and well-remembered associate, the late Senator from Florida.

But for the ill health which so unfortunately hampered the activities of his later years, Senator MALLORY would have left a far longer record of personal achievement. Yet all of us who knew him here know well how great a contribution to the vast work of legislation was his conscientious service on his committees and his close attention to the business of the Senate when he was not debarred by sheer lack of physical strength or by physical suffering. The keenness of his well-trained intellect drove right to the heart of a complex and baffling problem. Able as he was, earnest and devoted, he had that all-essential quality often lacking in men of really great ability and high purpose, and that is that fine, strong, human talent for working harmoniously and effectively with his fellow-men.

Such a public man as this—intellectual, learned, patriotic, high-souled, generous—is sure to inspire affection among all with whom he meets and works in the great and important responsibilities of the American Senate. We who knew Senator MALLORY think of him to-day with admiration and gratitude—aye, but with something even warmer than that, more human and more enduring. He was distinguished as a Senator, and he was also lovable as a man. So it is with a grief deep and personal, and not in any mere ceremonious way, that we meet here to-day to speak of him, to recall his vanished face and form, his gracious words and noble work, and to do honor to a dear and sainted memory.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in a body so limited in its membership as is the Senate, with so long a term of service and with daily associations, it is readily appreciated that the personal relationship between Senators is naturally intimate and close. When death removes one of our number, it nearly touches each one of us. It is almost as when one is fatally stricken in the family circle. During the term of my service here many Senators have died while in office. The roll is long and includes many honored names. Almost all of them have been old men—men who at the close of long public careers have laid down their work when fully done.

There is at such times solace in the thought that in such cases, with rare exceptions, life has been closed as it was designed; that its duties had been performed, its pleasures enjoyed, and its honors won. The day with them had run its course. For them there had been the rosy dawn, the morning bright with its preparation and its hopes, the noontide quick with its struggles and its activities, and the evening rich in contentment and in the recompenses which their labors had gathered. And then, when the full-orbed and undimmed sun had sunk in the west, there had come to them the restful night, and they had laid down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. President, the attention and the interest of the whole nation were most pleasantly excited when, in January last, a youth entered this Chamber bearing the commission of the State of Florida to represent her as an ambassador in this high council of the States. Barely beyond the limit of the age prescribed by the Constitution, he was with scarcely an exception the youngest man who had ever become a Senator of the United States. In securing at his age so exalted a station a great fortune had come to him. The honor that men strive for through long years in the hope that they may attain it as the reward of unwearied struggle had been bestowed upon him at the very outset of his career. His early morning was in very aglow with the promise to him of the fortunes and honors the most coveted by them. Contemplating the fortune which had crowned his youth, to the older Senators it was a long retrospect to the day, when at his age, they had looked forward in the distance, and when the hope was then born to them that in what then seemed the far future they might through weary years of effort reach a place in the Senate. At the point where their hopes had begun his success had been achieved.

He was handsome in person, modest in his demeanor, and without demonstration quietly cordial in his address. The brevity of his service here gave no opportunity for the demonstration in this arena of his mental abilities, but the reputation of his achievements in other fields left no doubt that as opportunity offered he would measure up to the full stature required in the high and responsible station to which he had come. It is a fact which will be recognized by all here that as the days passed he grew steadily in the favor and esteem of Senators, and with this growing favor and esteem our interest deepened in the personality and the fortunes of one so rich in such unusual opportunity and so fitted for its improvement.

How dearly he loved and cherished his native State and her fame is shown in the letter which he addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, February 14, 1908, asking that the name of Florida might be given to one of the future battle ships, and when the ship which will bear that name goes into commission it is fitting that she shall forever thereafter wear some appropriate memorial to Senator BRYAN.

Singularly and by accident, in the selection of seats upon his entrance here, his was adjoining the seat of Senator WHYTE, of Maryland, and thus there sat side by side the oldest and the youngest Senators in the Chamber, the venerable octogenarian and the youth of 31. In going to and from my seat in the Chamber it was necessary for me to pass them by, and frequently in so doing I have laid a hand at once on the shoulder of each of them and inquired: "How are the boys to-day?"—a pleasantry always smilingly recognized by each, and never seeming to them to grow old with repetition. Senator WHYTE, although 84 years of age, was then active physically and mentally, and Senator BRYAN was far below the meridian of life. What possible anticipation could have told that within a few short weeks, and within five days of each other, the funeral crape would be draped upon each of these two adjoining desks in token that those who had sat at them had gone out from among us forever? But so it was.

One day Senator BRYAN was missed from his accustomed seat. The report came that he was not well. Days lapsed into weeks, and still his seat was vacant, and we were told each day of the tightening grip of the illness which had fastened upon him; but when at its worst it seemed incredible that so much of youthful vigor, so much of hope and promise, could die, and we felt that surely he would recover and again be with us. But it was not to be, and on that beautiful Sabbath morning to us there came as a shock and a great sorrow the tidings that our youngest brother, our Benjamin, was dead.

Sir, in the annals of the Senate, past and future, there will never be recorded an event more pathetic than this. With the greatest of prizes within his grasp, while upon the dizzy heights from which there stretched the almost limitless scene of the years of his widening influence and power, ere his fascinated gaze could fairly view the far-reaching horizon, the sun of his life, in the early morning hour, darkened into the unending night.

Those of us who were commissioned thereto by the Senate sadly bore him back to his stricken family and friends in his loved Florida; and there within her bosom, beneath the drooping moss which shall ever mourn his untimely end, and amid the tender spring flowers which in their wakening from their winter sleep told of the new life which shall again come to him, they laid him to his final earthly rest.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, within the space of less than one year Senators MORGAN and PETTUS, of Alabama, LATIMER, of South Carolina, PROCTOR, of Vermont, WHYTE, of Maryland, and both MALLORY and BRYAN, of Florida, have been removed from the scene of their labors by the Omnipotent One who wills the coming and going of His creatures.

These losses, in proportion to numbers, are greater than the average number killed in a great and fierce battle.

They show that we walk in our daily ways as soldiers under fire, and none may tell who next will lie amongst the fallen. The oldest Senator and the youngest are enrolled amongst these dead, and neither youth nor age can wear a shield against the dart that struck them down.

MORGAN and PETTUS were recently commemorated by their colleagues in this body on the same day. At that time such an event was without precedent, but the precedent has been speedily repeated, and to-day our farewell tributes are bestowed upon MALLORY and BRYAN, who passed away in swift succession.

STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY was an able man, a learned man, a patriotic and a good man. He made an excellent Senator, and of his useful service the records of the Senate bear witness.

In conduct and character he realized Blackstone's ideal of a good citizen, for he "lived honestly, hurt nobody, and rendered to every man his due."

He was punctilious in the discharge of every task. The whole Senate respected him highly, and by his intimates he was beloved.

He was always modest and unobtrusive, neither provoking nor giving offense, and he had no enemy amongst his colleagues. He was as manly as he was modest, and in debate was as firm and assertive as became the dignity of his personality and of the body to which he belonged. A certain refinement, both of appearance, manner and speech, indicated the instincts which make the character of the gentleman. The cleanness and clearness of his mind were illustrated whenever he spoke in argument upon this floor. His positions were chosen with wisdom, his views were uttered with precision; whatever he thought was so succinctly and forcibly expressed that none failed to understand his meaning or to be impressed by the force and earnestness of his nature. No man could ever question either the propriety or the integrity of his course, and his good name was as precious ointment.

His father, Stephen Russell Mallory, was the fourth Senator of the new State of Florida, and served ten years. Our late colleague was the fourteenth Senator elected by that State and served an equal time. His father became secretary of the navy of the Confederate States, which when he assumed the office was only a name, but he made a navy. Little and makeshift as it was, it held its position on the James River as long as Lee held his lines on land, and, as war is a great teacher, its history and achievements will be studied and those who study them will find a lesson taught, which will appease anxiety as to this country being ever overrun by an enemy in war.

The younger MALLORY was born in 1848. He became the bearer of arms in the Confederate army in the autumn of 1864, and was soon made a midshipman in the Confederate navy, and served on the Patrick Henry in the James River fleet until war speedily ended. It was at a time when, as Grant said, the Confederates had robbed the cradle and the grave for their recruits, and the dissolution of the Confederacy, of which their very presence was a sign, was soon fulfilled.

As the South dropped the sword it picked up the pruning hook, seized the plow handles, and opened anew its neglected books. The steps by which MALLORY advanced to fields of large usefulness and honor are indicated by his successive occupations.

We find him at Georgetown College in 1865; a graduate of that institution in 1869; a professor of Latin and Greek in the service of his Alma Mater; again a student, teaching himself the law; at New Orleans a practitioner of the supreme court of Louisiana in 1873, and then, in 1874, settling down in his old home in Pensacola beginning practice.

It is in the legislatures of the States that many of our most distinguished statesmen have learned something of the art of legislation. In 1875 he was in the house of representatives of Florida. He was elected to the State senator in 1880 and again in 1884. A little later his capacities were so developed and were so well recognized by his constituents that he was sent in succession for two terms to the House of Representatives of the United States. In 1897 he was chosen to the United States Senate. When he died he was in the second term of a ripe experience and of a service valuable in all its connections with the interests of his State and country. He had been a member of all the legislative bodies known to the administration of the governments of the State and of the United States, and in each of those bodies he had well performed his part and left a memorial of his labors.

Amongst other measures with which Senator MALLORY was identified was one which he offered in the Fifty-ninth Congress looking to the enlarged usefulness of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. He realized what we all know, that the pestilence which wasted at noonday is far more destructive and terrible to the human race than is battle, and that more perish from disease in war than by the bayonet, the bullet, and the sword.

Mr. MALLORY was for years troubled by a physical ailment which was to him a source of constant impediment and suffering. How patiently and unmurmuring he bore his burden all of us know. Christian by faith and by profession, his life was the best insignia of his devotion. A soldier of the cross and a bearer of the cross, he fought the good fight without display of banners, and he closed his life the real conqueror who had conquered and subdued himself.

He had scarce reached three score. To one of his simple life, his strong nerve, his prudent and well-ordered disposition, a score or more of years might have been reasonably anticipated as his portion; but it was not so ordered.

The acclaims of the multitude, the conspicuous display of public honors, the dazzling badges of distinction, the resounding speech of eulogy, and the printed page; all these things which flatter the vanity and stiffen the pride of man have their place even in the just economy of life's ambitions, which urge on and measurably reward men in their best endeavors.

MALLORY had no burning ambition for these things. He lived on the work that was for him to do, and he bore to the grave that highest of earthly comforts that God has ever vouchsafed to the workers of His will—the calm repose of the spirit which holds itself in peace to all others and so goes its way to that peace which passeth all understanding.

Scarce had he died at his own home, on December 23, 1907, than a new name took its place by the appointment by the governor of Florida on the Senate roll, and WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, with the freshness of youth, stepped into the Senate. Only seventy-three days was he here, and over thirty of them were spent in the weariness and affliction of a mortal malady, of which he died on the 22d day of March, 1908.

Painfully did he illustrate the lines:

> Life can little more supply
> Than just to look about us and to die.

He was a native of Florida and of a family notable in its private worth and in its honest and useful service. He was himself tall, slender, straight, and handsome, an athlete and a student, a graduate of Emory College, Georgia, and then of Washington and Lee University in Virginia. A recognized orator and debater amongst the young men who were his fellow-students, a lawyer who was soon chosen as solicitor in his community, a successful practitioner, with the beckoning rewards and honors of his profession swiftly extended, no young man could have had a more auspicious or promising position amongst his people.

Added to these things were his happy marriage to Miss Allan, of Lexington, Va., a daughter of Col. William Allan, a man who had won the honors of war as the chief of ordnance in Jackson's corps, and the honors of peace as a writer of history and as a professor in Washington and Lee University.

On Christmas day came to BRYAN a commission to the Senate of the United States. His bearing here fulfilled the expectations of those who saw in him the making of a long, honorable, and useful career.

> He heard his days before him and the trumpet of his life.

But those days were not to be fulfilled.

He had barely time to become acquainted with and on easy terms with his associates when came the lingering sickness which afflicted him, and then the solemn repose of death.

The names of MALLORY and BRYAN will ever linger in the memories of those who knew them here. They will long be cherished in their State and honored by them whom they honored. They may remind us of the flickering and how soon extinguished is the flame of life, but in the generous economy of that Providence which permits nothing to be lost, their lives intermingle with the meditations of those who come after them, repressing unworthy things, inspiring virtuous deeds and aspirations, and cheering the column of humanity as it moves in its successive generations of toil and conflict, of achievements and disappointments, of sickness and sorrow, and pain and death to—

> That one far off divine event,
> To which the whole creation moves.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in conformity with an ancient practice of the Senate we again meet to pay a last sad tribute of respect to a former member of this body. WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN took his seat in the Senate on the 9th day of last January, appointed by the governor of Florida to fill a vacancy caused by the death of the lamented STEPHEN R. MALLORY.

When he reported at the desk to take the oath of office Mr. BRYAN presented a perfect picture of fervid youth and manly form. He had not reached his thirty-second year and he appeared younger. To all who gazed upon his tall and slender, but strong and athletic form, his clearly defined and classical features, the impression was irresistible that a Senatorial career had just begun which was destined to be long continued, well sustained, and highly honored.

That he was a man of exalted character and distinct intellectual endowments was made manifest by every feature of his appearance. Gentle breeding, kindly disposition, keen perception, self-restraint, and dignified poise were conspicuous characteristics of his individuality. Sedate and thoughtful demeanor subdued the ordinary impressions of youth associated with one of his age.

As though by some strange design of fate in seeking to bring forth striking contrasts he was assigned to a seat in the Senate nearby the venerable Senator WHYTE of Maryland. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE had been a conspicuous figure in State and national affairs for more than thirty years before Mr. BRYAN was born. The oldest Senator and the youngest Senator side by side in the Chamber furnished subjects for reflection, but not for doubt, as everyone knew that the venerable Senator from Maryland must soon, in the natural order of events, surrender to their final impulses the hovering powers of life, but as to the young Senator from Florida speculation was not indulged, because all rested secure in the confident belief that there would be vouchsafed to him, according to the same order of nature, an indefinite period of activity.

The material of history again shows how vain are human calculations, for before the spring had fairly opened the Senate was called upon to suspend its labors while consigning to their last long resting place the Senator from Maryland, its oldest member, and but a few days later the Senator from Florida, its youngest member. For the death of the aged we were prepared, and the grief inseparable from sundered ties was assuaged by the knowledge of a long life, well rounded out with splendid deeds; but for the youth stricken down at the very threshold of a career of great promise and superb opportunity such consolation was denied.

WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE had lived beyond the allotted span of life, and all his capacity for achievement had been accorded ample scope. WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, on the other hand, was called away from the field of endeavor when inviting opportunity bade him remain to render just account for the high moral and intellectual treasure committed to his care. That he lived up to the full measure of his opportunities and accomplished more than is ordinarily given to man to accomplish in the opening years of an active life is recorded, known, and cherished by those who knew and loved him, but what he might have accomplished had his span of life been projected into the unknown future must always remain a sad and an unsolved mystery. We do know that his frank and manly demeanor not only challenged the respect of the Senate, but also attracted the attention and called forth the approval of the President of the United States.

The customs of the Senate are so established and its orders of business are so arranged that Senators new in service feel naturally inclined to abide the maturing and ripening process preparatory to entering upon the direction of public affairs with a degree of self-assertion requisite to the presentation of all the elements of which strong individuality is composed. Naturally modest and unobtrusive, Mr. BRYAN yielded to the ancient custom, and thus it came to pass that in his brief service of about sixty days no fitting occasion appeared to him for presentation to the Senate of his general views on public questions. But notwithstanding that fact, the membership of this body, trained to observe and quick to detect worthy elements of character, had quietly formed such an opinion of this young man as to bring with his death a sense of great loss.

To the Senate his manliness was captivating and the possibilities of his character were interesting. In the language of Denham—

> Youth what man's age is like to be doth show;
> We may our ends by our beginnings know.

From the first fruits of a tree we may learn what is to be expected in the future, and thus we may well believe that WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, the youngest Senator of the United States ever consigned to the tomb, gave promise of a career of great usefulness.

To the Commonwealth of Florida, which tendered his services to the nation, to his neighbors, friends, and political associates, we may send messages of condolence, but to the stricken and sorely afflicted little family, whose pride and comfort and support he was, no adequate measure of solace or sympathy can be embraced in words. We can only suggest the illuminating hope of the Christian world by saying:

> God gave, He took, He will restore, He doeth all things well.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, we all know, especially those who have been for a long time members of this or other legislative bodies, that the most effective work leading to material results in the way of legislation is not always accomplished by those who are regarded as great orators or great debaters, but rather by that other class of legislators who are not much given to debate or oratory. This class is made up of those men who do the hard and substantial work of the legislative body. They are usually the men who are active participants in the work on committees and who prepare and formulate legislative measures and who put them in practical and effective shape. To this class of industrious, unobtrusive, and quiet workers belonged our late colleague, Senator MALLORY. I became intimately acquainted with him soon after he made his first appearance in the Senate, and during his entire service in this body we were associated on one of the most important committees, and frequently during that time we were thrown together as members of important subcommittees which had under consideration many important and far-reaching measures, and in such committee work I found him to be one of the best-equipped, one of the most industrious, and one of the most efficient of Senators.

He seemed to grasp intuitively, as it were, the full importance and scope of every important measure that was under consideration, and if the measure had come to the committee in a crude and imperfect form he always seemed to know how to prune, correct, and improve it; and he never allowed a spirit of partisanship to control or warp him to any extent. Senator MALLORY was a most excellent lawyer, well grounded in the fundamental principles of constitutional and common law, and hence was always able to determine the true legal scope and constitutional validity of any pending bill or proposition.

He was barely old enough to serve in the Confederate army and navy during the last two years of the civil war, and his army and naval service no doubt left its impress on his physical constitution, so that he was not as strong and rugged as he otherwise might have been if he had not been engaged in such service; but this service, in connection with his legal training, seemed to have equipped him for the important duties of a legislator in a very high degree. And he was as loyal and faithful to the welfare of our entire country in all his public duties as though he had never at any time borne arms against her.

While he may not have been regarded either as an orator or a great debater, nevertheless he would on occasions discuss important measures in a clear, succinct, and instructive manner. He never spoke for the mere sake of making a speech. He was never given to posing as a legislator for mere show or to attract attention. To him the work of legislation was a serious matter and he was always serious and in earnest in respect to any proposition or measure that he had in charge or advocated. He was in no sense a radical, but rather inclined to be conservative, prudent, and careful in all his legislative efforts. Whenever he spoke in this body he was always listened to and always gave the Senate valuable information and demonstrated that his judgment was sound and that he was possessed of the true conservative spirit.

A legislative body composed of men like Senator MALLORY would not be apt to make mistakes, but would move along safe and conservative lines and never drift into slipshod legislation and never pander to public clamor. He took a broad and national view rathér than a mere local view of great legislative problems, and never seemed to be a creature of, or tied down to, mere local environment. He was always a faithful attendant upon committees and upon the sessions of the Senate, and never sought to shirk his duties and his work in any direction. I served with him on important subcommittees when I knew his health was poor and that he was hardly in a condition to work, and yet he would stick to his task as faithfully and as thoroughly as though he were in the prime of life. He was a true son of the South, typical of all that is bravest and best among the Southern people, and while his heart and his spirit were with his State and his people, his legislative vision extended to the entire country, whose welfare he had at heart as fully and to as great an extent as any member of this body.

His State never had a more earnest, a more hard-working, or a more faithful representative in this Senate. He was a most kind hearted and lovable man, as companionable, and as ready to form true and real friendships as any man with whom I have ever come in contact. As a member of the committee on which we were so long associated I miss him very much, and I know all his colleagues in this body feel his loss most keenly.

The generation of men who participated in the great civil war are rapidly passing away, and in a few years more none of them will be left; but when they have finished their task and finally passed away and finally surrendered to that inexorable fate that awaits us all, the verdict of history will be that they, both of the North and of the South, were big enough and great enough to unite and cooperate in the great and noble task of healing the wounds of the war and recementing the bonds of the Union and of placing it upon a more permanent and enduring basis than ever, and of zealously cooperating to extend, fortify, and perpetuate the moral and industrial greatness of our common country; and it will redound to his glory and be something that his descendants may look back to with pride that Senator MALLORY was one of the prominent members of this class.

In the latter years of his life he was in poor health; but in the midst of his afflictions, and in spite of them, he struggled along bravely and heroically with his Senatorial duties, always aiming to do his share of the work and never complaining; but I have no doubt that in the midst of it he often felt like exclaiming in the language of Father Ryan:

> And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er;
> For down the west
> Life's sun is setting, and I see the shore
> Where I shall rest.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I had hardly taken my seat in the Senate of the United States before the State of Florida sent to that body the noble young man whose death we mourn today, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN.

Adjacent to my seat in this Chamber, at this session, sat the oldest and the youngest Senator, and by some inscrutable act of Providence each was taken from my side—Senator WHYTE, of Maryland, the oldest, and Senator BRYAN, the youngest.

Senator WHYTE had rounded out a long and honorable public life and was ripe in years. Senator BRYAN, at the very early age of 32, had come to the Senate full of the buoyancy of youth, full of life, full of the earnest desire to be of service to his State and to the people of the United States.

I was greatly drawn to him and immediately there was established between us a sense of comradeship, of affection, and regard. It had not seemed possible to me that his summons could come so suddenly.

I recall the pleasure I had in discussing with him, among other interests, his athletic sports, his games of football, in which he showed the keen zest of the athlete delighting in vigorous exercise in the open air.

He was an athlete not only on the ball ground, but he was also an athlete intellectually, with a mind whose thoughts were as clear and as brilliant as the light of a diamond. A more vigorous specimen of a young man could never be found, tall, erect, sinewy, and strong; with a graceful carriage and a splendid pose, he presented the picture of physical perfection.

I have never seen a finer head—a high and noble brow, features as finely carved as a perfect cameo. An artist hand could not have improved the perfection of that face. It was the handiwork of the master artist, the Maker and the Creator of men.

Mr. President, the physical beauty of this young man was but the outer form of a spirit more noble and beautiful within, an intelligence of the first magnitude, a spirit whose purity and whose high moral purpose had already fitted him to become one of the archangels of God.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that death is an evil. I am not one of those who believe that death is to be deplored. Indeed, Mr. President, it seems to me that death is but the laying aside of the mortal frame in preparation for the higher form of spiritual life, where the activity of the soul and of the mind are engaged in a more exalted sphere.

The human senses which receive impressions of material matter are but clumsy instruments with which to comprehend the higher forms of life. The sense of hearing fails to perceive the higher vibrations of sound; the sense of sight fails to receive the higher forms of vibration of light; and we are constantly admonished in our daily experience that none of the organs of the body are requisite or necessary to the sensations of the soul.

When our bodies are receiving the reparation of complete repose, when the body lies inert and senseless in profound slumber, then the soul is nevertheless awake, unguided, however, as an untrained child entering in new fields of inexperience and without the power of self-direction, receiving impressions as various and as strange as fall upon the sight of a newborn babe opening its eyes and receiving impressions of things not understood in a new and strange world.

With the eyes of the human body closed, and in the dark, without operation of the optic nerve, nevertheless we see. We see nature in every form, we see vividly and clearly a thousand objects of every form and color, and without the use of the nerves of the body we exercise every function of sight, of hearing, of taste, of smell, of speech, without using those muscles or nerves by which physical impressions are received during our waking hours. Men say they dream and think no further, and do not realize that the soul is acting, is seeing without eyes and hearing without ears; that the soul does not need the optic or the auditory nerve in exercising the sense of sight or of hearing.

Nor is there any truth in the theory of philosophers who say that these sensations experienced by the soul are but the impressions of things which have been revived by memory.

Mr. President, the great Creator who made the beautiful form of our departed friend and brother, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, and who made his more beautiful soul, inflicted no evil upon him when He transferred his spirit into its sphere of higher service.

This glorious young man was prepared for greater purposes. He had served with great usefulness among his fellow-men. He had set a shining example to the young men of our country as a physical athlete, as a student, as a scholar, as a man of practical affairs, as a patriot, as a vigorous public servant, as a good citizen. He had demonstrated to every young man how great a degree of distinction is possible within a few short years of virtuous and honest effort. What he has done other men may do, and he has greatly served his country in setting an honorable and a high example to the young men of our beloved Republic.

Mr. President, it is not with me merely a sanguine opinion or a pleasing hope when I express the conviction of my soul that what we call death is merely a transition into a higher form of spiritual life.

In that great and new sphere of activity this splendid young son of Florida will carry with him the same high purpose which he exhibited in this life and will be found among the angels of our Lord serving his Maker and the spirits of the blest in his new sphere with the same noble zeal which caused for him great preferment in this life, which brought to him in this life the admiration, the affection, and the love of all who knew him. May he be doubly blessed in his divine pathway through the stars.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, my first acquaintance with the late Senator MALLORY began in March, 1897. We began public life in the Senate at the same time. He was elected to the United States Senate by the legislature of Florida for the term beginning March 4, 1897. I was elected by the legislature of Georgia for the term beginning the same time. We served continuously together in the Senate for nearly eleven years, and about half of that time we were members of the Committee on Commerce, and I knew much of his services as a public man and Senator. We were warm personal friends, and I will not be accused of exaggeration when I say that Senator MALLORY had the respect, the confidence, and esteem of every Member of the Senate with whom he served. He had held many positions of trust and honor in his own State before he was elected a member of this body. He had served in both branches of the legislature of Florida with honor and distinction, and had served two terms as a Member of the Lower House of Congress. Mr. MALLORY was elected to the United States Senate when he was not a candidate, and his services for the first term were so valuable and satisfactory to his constituents that he was returned a second term without opposition. Had his life been spared he doubtless would have been elected for a third term, for he constantly grew in popularity with the people of Florida. When Senator MALLORY first came to the Senate he was in wretched health, but, notwithstanding this fact, he was diligent and attentive in the discharge of his public duties, and especially devoted to his work on the Commerce Committee, where he was so valuable in securing the necessary appropriations to develop the waterways and protect the coast of his State. All of his associates recognized him as a very valuable member of this body.

He possessed an analytical mind, reached his conclusions slowly, but when he formed an opinion his associates rarely questioned the soundness of his views. He was genial, lovable in all the relations of life, was modest, sincere, and hated every form of wrong and loved justice. His life was dominated by the highest moral purpose. His ideals were lofty. I am sure he lived for that which was noble, pure, and uplifting. He made one of the most valuable members of the Committee on Commerce. He took deep interest in the development of our waterways, and his opinions on any subject before that committee always carried the greatest weight. He served on subcommittees in solving the most important problems before the Committee on Commerce, and he was diligent in his attendance and untiring in his efforts to faithfully discharge his duty. His intellect was of the highest order, grasping every phase of a subject, overlooking no detail, going to the core of the most complicated problems. In investigating public questions he was actuated by the purest of motives. He sought to know the very right of things. He was a man of positive convictions, and was always moved by those convictions. Convince Senator MALLORY that a proposition was right and no power could move him from supporting the right. While positive and firm in supporting his views on public questions, he was kind and gentle, "tender as a woman and guileless as a child," and sincere and loving in his friendships.

Florida lies adjacent to Georgia. The people of my State have always been deeply interested in the growth and progress of our sister State. I knew of Senator MALLORY as a public man before he became a member of the Senate, and of his high character and standing in Florida. His growth was a steady one. Each day he grew stronger in the confidence and affections of his associates. During the eleven years that I served with him in the Senate I have never heard an unkind word spoken of him. Both his friends and foes in political life in Florida recognized in him a man of ability, of sterling integrity, and the broadest patriotism.

No man can gain and retain the public esteem and affections of the people of his State as he held them without having rare qualities of mind and heart. Partisan considerations and prejudices never warped his judgment, but with an even temper, an impartial mind, he was found where justice and equity prevailed. Everyone who knew him and watched his career pointed to him as an upright man, an able, conscientious, and honest public official. No one ever questioned his integrity, and his private life was without a blemish. Few men possessed and enjoyed the confidence of their associates as did Senator MALLORY. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, representing with distinction and ability his State in the Senate for more than a quarter of a century, recognized Senator MALLORY as one of the most valuable members of his committee. This high opinion of the deceased was entertained by every member of that committee. He loved his native State. He diligently studied to advance the interests of that State; but he not only loved Florida, but was devoted to the entire country. No one ever heard him speak disparagingly of any section of his country. He recognized that the Republic was composed of States and that the Senator who assaulted any section of his country assaulted the Republic. He acted upon the theory that a Senator who was the enemy of any section was the enemy of his country. Sometimes we are swayed by partisan considerations and are inclined to criticise one section of the Republic in comparison with another. But our dead friend loved Maine, Massachusetts, Florida, Georgia, New York, Virginia, and every State in the American Union. He had studied the history of his country. He had watched with pride the rapid progress we had made, and his statesmanship was of the highest character, recognizing that it was the duty of a Senator not only to represent his own State, but to advance in every possible way the interests and welfare of the entire nation.

His life is a lesson to the American youth. Although in wretched health, a constant sufferer, he struggled and triumphed over difficulties. He rose step by step in the estimation of the community where he lived and won one victory after another and at last honorably reached one of the highest places of public life, where his usefulness was recognized by the entire country.

How did he achieve success? Why is his memory held in such high esteem by his countrymen and associates in this body? The answer can easily be made. He led an honest, industrious life, was faithful in the discharge of every duty, and such a life is always properly rewarded. We can say to the American youth: "Follow in his footsteps—lead an honest, industrious life, be faithful in the discharge of every duty, and success will crown your efforts."

Illustrious and sterling honesty will always be rewarded. Temporary success gained by undue advantage and dishonorable conduct will always end in ruin and disgrace. The future of the Republic depends upon the education and training of the American youth. Most of the education and the training we acquire comes from contact with others. Education by association and example is a powerful factor in forming character. Association with the intelligent, the industrious, and the good tends to elevate and build up. Association with those who lead an indolent, dishonest, and immoral life tends to corrupt and degrade. A life of continued exhibition of high morals, purity of soul, and Christian charity is a source of strength and elevation to any community. The young men of a community respect, honor, and follow such a life.

Senator MALLORY was not sensational. He possessed none of the arts of the demagogue. He was not a meteor in the political firmament. He never sought notoriety. He gradually built himself up in the confidence and esteem of the Senate by real, genuine worth. Each day he grew stronger and more useful.

But, Mr. President, his work is finished, but his influence will never die.

Mr. President, I have been a member of this body eleven years, and the mortality of the Senate during that period has been remarkable. Senators who have been members of this body since March 4, 1897, will recall those of our number who have gone to the world beyond. The Senators who have died during this period are as follows:

Alabama.—John T. Morgan, Edmund W. Pettus.
Connecticut.—O. H. Platt, J. R. Hawley.
Florida.—STEPHEN R. MALLORY, WILLIAM J. BRYAN.
Iowa.—J. H. Gear.
Maryland.—Arthur P. Gorman, William Pinkney Whyte.
Massachusetts.—George F. Hoar.
Michigan.—James McMillan, Russell A. Alger.
Minnesota.—Cushman K. Davis.
Mississippi.—Edward C. Walthall.
New Jersey.—William J. Sewell.

South Dakota.—James H. Kyle.
Ohio.—Marcus A. Hanna.
Oregon.—John H. Mitchell.
Pennsylvania.—Matthew S. Quay.
South Carolina.—Joseph H. Earle, A. C. Latimer.
Tennessee.—William B. Bate, Isham G. Harris.
Vermont.—Redfield Proctor, Justin S. Morrill.

Four Senators who died after ceasing to be Senators were:

Donelson Caffrey, of Louisiana; Stephen M. White, of California; Edward O. Wolcott, of Colorado; George G. Vest, of Missouri.

Mr. President, the same modesty which characterized the entire life of Senator MALLORY was exemplified in his death. The custom has long prevailed in this Senate, when a Senator dies, to appoint a committee of Senators and Representatives to attend his funeral. But Senator MALLORY desired a simple, plain burial, "dying as he lived—an honest, self-respecting gentleman."

I repeat, Mr. President, that Senator MALLORY's growth was a steady one, the result of a modest, sincere, and studious life. In Washington, after becoming a Member of Congress, he lived the same plain, temperate, economical life. His influence was not derived from social functions, but from work and worth. No scandal was ever connected with his name in either private or public life. He was not the representative of any trust, combine, or special interest, neither was he ever engaged in the advancement of his own schemes, using his office as a means to an end. He was a plain, straightforward, unassuming gentleman, a sound thinker, a fearless advocate of what he believed to be right. Senator MALLORY was a stanch friend of honest, clean, economical government. He sought in every possible way to elevate the standard of our civilization, and by precept and example to prepare and qualify our young men for the highest possible standard of citizenship. He abhorred every form of hypocrisy and deceit. He left no doubt upon the minds of those who heard him as to the earnestness of his convictions. Those who differed with him knew he was both honest and sincere. He did his own thinking, formed his own conclusions, and sought diligently to reach conclusions that were just and right. He believed that a Senator should be under no personal obligations to any power and that a Senator should do his own thinking. He formed high ideals and lived up to them. No man is perfect. Doubtless Senator MALLORY had his faults; but if so, I was never able to discover them. I am glad that such a man lived, and I am sure his influence will never die. I most cheerfully place upon the records of the Senate my tribute of affection and admiration for the memory of the deceased.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, born in the centennial year of the great Republic, endowed with all the graces of mind and body, entering as a Member of this Senate at an age which gave full promise of a long and illustrious public life, our young Senator was stricken at the very threshold of his career. He had seemed marked from the beginning as one destined to serve his State and nation by natural gifts and immediate opportunity given to few. Young in years and just from his books, he was called to serve his native State in high position in her chief city, and at once addressed himself to the duties of county solicitor in such a way as to promote in the greatest degree the law and order, and the moral upbuilding of the community whose servant he was. Enjoying the full confidence of his fellow-citizens, having performed his every duty as a civil officer, and by his services having given full proof of his high sense of public duty, Governor Broward on Christmas day, 1907, tendered to him the appointment as Senator of the United States from the State of Florida, and on the following day the appointment was made in legal form. Thus, at the early age of 31 years, we find him clothed with the highest legislative honor in all the world. It is not for us to know the pride, both to himself and to his young wife, that this appointment brought. The youthful enthusiasm, the generous ambitions, and the patriotic aspirations of his heart we can well imagine.

During his brief service here his personal appearance, his modest bearing, and the interest and ardor with which he entered upon his work gave him a most friendly standing at once; but it was not given him to serve his country long. His sun set while it was yet day. What he was, the love in which he was held by those who knew him best, bears witness. What he might have been, had his life been spared, may, perhaps, be read in the hearts and hopes of those who loved him best, and whose prophecies reached far out into the years to come. To them he has left a memory redolent with the fragrance of youth, and in them will always rest the reasonable and comforting assurance that had he not been called away in his youth his future years would have reached and reaped the highest honors of his native land.

It was my mournful privilege to accompany his funeral train to the city of Jacksonville, and seldom have I seen one more sincerely mourned. Only words of love and affection were heard, and it seemed as though the multitude who paid him last sad tribute thought more of his private virtues than even of his great public position; and from all the expressions of sorrow, from all the tributes of friends and neighbors I could but think that if it could ever be justly said of any man, it could be said of WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN that—

He wore the white flower of a blameless life.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the South has been more than fortunate in the men she has sent to represent her in the Senate of the United States. They have been selected from among the ablest and best of her citizens, and have brought to this Chamber an influence for honest and conscientious endeavor that has comported with the high standards set by the greatest of those who have preceded us. We have recently had cause to mourn with her for great and irreparable losses which she has sustained. Some of the most distinguished Americans of this generation who have occupied seats here have been lost to us through death within a year, and among them are numbered some of the South's greatest men. Of these is STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY.

My acquaintance with Senator MALLORY began when he first became a member of this body in 1897. I was instinctively attracted to him by reason of his honesty and sincerity, and soon my admiration was awakened through the recognition of those great powers which he possessed, but which his modesty prevented him from displaying, except on such occasions as specially demanded their exercise. But it was not long before his ability was fully recognized here, and he took a place among the foremost men of the Senate. I was associated with him on the committees of Naval Affairs and of Commerce, and there had the opportunity to learn his peculiar fitness for such matters as came before us. He was unusually well equipped for the discussion of such business as arose, by reason of his early experience in maritime affairs which excited within him an interest that never flagged. He was the son of the secretary of the navy of the Confederate States, and in his early youth he was appointed a midshipman in the Confederate navy, and though his service was short on account of the end of the war, he imbibed the spirit which naval training and following the sea gives, and which is one of the most valuable possessions which a man can have. However short may have been a man's connection with a fighting sea force, there will inevitably be born within him an ambition to emulate the deeds of bravery and self-sacrifice which illuminate all maritime history.

The men who sail the seas, whether in an armored vessel of a navy or on a merchantman or fishing schooner, have experiences which toughen the moral fiber, which cultivate self-reliance, which promote unselfishness, which cultivate generosity, and promote honesty in the dealings of man with man. And the traditions of the sea, which will always be of vital interest to one who has once been connected with it, transmit and perpetuate all these influences which make for courage, honesty, and sincerity. Senator MALLORY came within these influences, and in him they contributed to the formation of that strong character which commanded the respect of all who knew him. His devotion to public duty was untiring, and no constituency has ever had a representative here whose interests were more carefully studied. He loved his native State with the ardor which characterizes the affection of all Southrons for the State of their birth. The glamor of romance and adventure which was cast over that fair land by the search by Ponce de Leon for the fountain of perpetual youth, and the name which he gave the unknown region when he saw it brilliant with the flowers of a Palm Sunday nearly four centuries ago, undoubtedly have had their influence in strengthening the devotion which is felt for it by all who claim Florida for their native State or adopted home. That of Senator MALLORY was sweet, simple, and sincere, as was his own character. That devotion accentuated his firm belief in the doctrine of States rights, which more than once he ably expounded before this body, and his education in the law and his training in the courts made him a powerful champion of the principle that the States are the possessors of every power not delegated to the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States.

Senator MALLORY began his public career early, and has been conspicuous in State and national affairs ever since. After the war he attended Georgetown College, graduating in 1869. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in Louisiana in 1873, and in 1876 was elected to the lower house of the Florida legislature, from which he passed successively to the State senate, the House of Representatives of the National Congress, and in 1897 to the Senate. His political career presents a record of clean, honest, efficient work, which gained for him the respect of all people and all parties.

Those who knew him admired him for his sterling integrity and his genial companionship. He was always true to himself, to his convictions, ideals, and his conceptions of the best public good. His heart went out to all that was good and noble in others, for he looked upon the manifestations of high character as of inestimable value as examples.

Example—

He once said—

is the most potent of preceptors. The object lesson is the most impressive method of reaching the understanding and shaping the inclination of the young, and the oftener we can present to their plastic minds authentic illustrations of character which of itself conquers adverse environment, rises to eminence by its innate merit, and wins the respect and esteem of good men and women, the greater the probability of our inspiring those who are to follow us with a zealous purpose to emulate such virtue.

This reveals his view of life, its duties, and its responsibilities, and we all know how closely he lived up to that high standard.

In his work in Congress he had ever before him the examples of the great men who in years gone by made this body illustrious, and he strove to reach their high level of pure statesmanship. And when he saw that the end of life was near he again exhibited that honest simplicity of character which endeared him to all who knew him. He wished that in the last duties which should be paid to him there should be that absence of even a suspicion of ostentation that had always characterized his acts in life. His wishes were respected, and he was quietly laid to rest by the friends he loved.

As one by one of our colleagues fail to answer the roll call in the Senate and we realize that we will never again hear their eloquent or persuasive voices, may we not well ask ourselves the question—

Oh why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a fast-flitting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
He passes from life to his rest in the grave.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I was one of a committee appointed by authority of the Senate to represent this body at the funeral of Senator BRYAN. In company with my colleagues I went to Florida and was present at the obsequies which marked the closing scene in his history, and I wish now to pay a brief tribute to his memory—an imperfect tribute, I know; but, none the less sincere. My acquaintance with Mr. BRYAN was of short duration. I never knew him until he came to the Senate on the appointment of the governor of Florida as the successor of Senator MALLORY. As we all know, he was here but a few weeks before he was stricken with the fatal malady which terminated his life. I can not speak of him, therefore, as one who knew him intimately or well. Nevertheless, during his service here I came to know him well enough to appreciate his sterling qualities and to regard him with high esteem. His service here was unhappily too brief to afford an opportunity for him to demonstrate his capabilities. Still, if I may judge, as well I may, by the beautiful things I hear said of him on every hand, I am safe in saying that all who knew him here felt, as I did, that his fine qualities of head and heart made him one not only to be loved and trusted, but one who gave great promise of the highest usefulness in the public service. That he was a man of unusual force is sufficiently attested by his achievements. When sworn in as a member of this body he was barely past the constitutional age of eligibility, and was one of the three youngest men who ever sat in the Senate. But before that he had in the exercise of his native powers forged his way to the front and had taken a high place among the leading men of his Commonwealth. He was ranked among the able lawyers of the Florida bar, and was universally esteemed as one of the potential men of the State. And so, when a vacancy occurred in the Senate by reason of the untimely fall of the lamented MALLORY, notwithstanding the comparative youth of Mr. BRYAN, there was no occasion for surprise or criticism when the State's executive selected him for the succession.

During his brief service here he impressed all with whom he came in contact as being a man of the finest type and of great promise and as one in every way worthy to wear the high honor conferred upon him. He was cast in that mold which produces men of lovable character and capable of great achievement. He was genial, companionable, and unpretentious; but then, Mr. President, the bravest are the tenderest, and modesty is to real manliness what courage is to chivalry. He was a man of fine intellectual endowments—a man of high ideals—a student and thinker, sensitive, high-strung, and honorable alike in thought and purpose and deed. His qualities were those which commanded respect and inspired confidence, and his equipoise, conservatism, and sound judgment marked him as one whose counsels would be characterized by wisdom and whose leadership would be distinguished by sagacity. Few men of his age have risen to such heights; and though his career is not without parallels, it was nevertheless rare and exceptional. Mr. President, while none rail against the inscrutable decrees of Providence, it does seem pitiful that a man of this kind, who while still little more than a youth had risen to a place so conspicuous among the leading men of a great State and who was just entering upon a new career with splendid promise in a larger field, should be stricken down. When venerable men like our late colleagues from Alabama, Vermont, and Maryland are summoned to take their places in the silent halls of death, however sensible we may be of loss or however much we may lament, the event when it comes is not unexpected nor the shock so acute. Such men have climbed life's rugged way to the summit and have "sounded all the depths and shoals of honor." They have run their course, lived out their lives—long, honorable, and useful lives—and when at last they fall as falls some lordly oak which has bared its naked arms to a hundred winters and shaken its green banners in the sunshine of as many summers, no matter how great the deprivation, we are conscious that it was something natural, inevitable, and expected.

But to see a young man like Senator BRYAN, already eminent, and yet with all his highest hopes and best opportunities before him, standing in the morning light with undimmed eyes uplifted to green hills and to loftier peaks beyond, suddenly stricken with the shriveling pain of death is something so terribly pathetic that it staggers even the strongest. It is a note struck on the chords of life so discordant that it puts the whole world out of tune, and we can not help pausing to wonder and to question. But wonder and question as we may, what answer will come to us? We can not answer for ourselves. In the presence of such a tragedy no unaided mortal wisdom can soothe the heart's tumult or silence the mind's protest. But this I know, that somewhere in the far-off summerland we have mothers—mothers who taught us to lisp a prayer in childhood days. Sometimes we fancy we can see their sweet, benignant faces smiling down through the shadows. If they could give answer to our questioning, they would tell us with that simple, sublime, submissive faith with which they comforted in the long ago, "It is God's will." And, after all, that old, familiar saying embodies all that Christian men can know concerning the stupendous mystery of death.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, to see the expanding light of this young life snuffed out as might have been the flickering blaze of a candle was pathetic. To see a young man like this cut down at the very inception of a career so full of promise was pitiful. Yet such tragedies come all too often to startle and appall us, and we are powerless to stay them. All we can do is to give sepulcher to the dead and enshrine them in our memories. And so it was with this splendid young son of Florida. We carried him back to the State he loved and to the people who trusted and honored him. Back to Florida—back to the home he had left so recently to enter upon his high duties here—back to the land of the everglade, the land of the magnolia and orange bloom, we bore him, tenderly and reverently. A great concourse of his countrymen, those who knew him best and loved him most, came to honor his memory. With gentle hands they laid him to rest and covered him with flowers, rare flowers, beautiful and sweet, in great profusion. And that was the end of this remarkable man and of his impressive career. With that his book of life was closed and clasped with a clasp, save that the work he did, his achievements, and his character will stand forever as an example and inspiration to the youth of Florida. And for this alone we know that WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN did not live in vain. The world is better that he lived, because he wrought for his country's good and the uplifting of mankind.

Mr. MILTON. Mr. President, I have not the gift of language nor of eloquence to fittingly portray the character and attainments of Florida's distinguished son, STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY, whose life, character, and public services we now pause from the customary duties of the Senate to commemorate and commend.

My reason for speaking on this occasion is not that I think I can do him justice, but these words of commendation, veneration, and eulogy, though weak and halting, come from a friend and are the only tribute he can pay. As flattery to the living is unjust, so fulsome praise of the dead seems mockery; therefore I speak of him as I think and feel.

More than twenty years ago I met STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY, and so impressed was I with his worth, pure character, integrity of heart and mind, and nobility of soul that whether he was in the shade of temporary political defeat, or crowned with the laurels of success, I was always his friend, admirer, and political follower. His friendship was an honor of which I feel justly proud.

Mr. MALLORY was a true type of a Southern gentleman and statesman, modest, courteous, wise. He was the worthy son of a great sire, and his life work was full and active, replete with Southern sentiment and instinct, but of national breadth and force in its statesmanship. He was born November 2, 1848, as the war clouds were gathering over this great land. His father was a member of this body from 1851 to 1861; therefore he was reared in the midst of the activities and battles of intellectual arguments which preceded the conflict of giant brothers.

At the age of 16 he entered the Confederate army of Virginia, and later became a midshipman in the navy of the South, freely risking his life fighting in that titanic struggle for what he deemed to be right then and believed to be right to the day of his death, the sovereign rights of a sovereign State.

At the close of the war he completed his education and began the practice of law. But his State, like other Southern States after the war, was suffering from the rule of ignorance, vice, and robbery. Thinking it his duty to again serve his country, he entered heartily in the struggle of the people of Florida to redeem her government from negro and carpetbag domination and in 1876 was elected a member of the Florida legislature. He was elected to the State senate in 1880 and returned again in 1884. In her legislative halls so ably did he serve the people that, feeling his abilities and usefulness should not be circumscribed by State bounds, he was elected to the National House of Representatives, and served two terms.

While here he so well represented the interest of Florida and so favorably impressed the citizenship of his State that in 1897, when the most momentous and bitter strife among Florida Democrats was waged, the representatives of the people turned to MALLORY as the only man who could properly represent them; and although he was not a candidate for the honorable position, he was elected to the United States Senate and reelected in 1905.

Here for nearly eleven years he gave to the service of his country the benefit of his ripened intellect. At the age of 59, while in the prime of life and the activity of his intellect, and while he bade fair to still give years of service to his country, he was mowed down by the grim reaper, Death.

As a soldier he was brave and gallant, bearing cheerfully the hardships necessarily imposed by reason of his impoverished country. He followed the flag of the lost cause with the same zeal, devotion, and self-sacrifice, which characterized the hero soldiers of the Confederacy.

As a citizen he was law-abiding, diligent in the discharge of his duties, and worked for the advancement of good government. He was modest and unassuming, but courageous and bold in the pursuit of and in the path of duty and never swayed by fleeting public opinion from the right, as he saw it.

As a friend he was honest, loyal, and true. He trusted and could be trusted. His conversation was pure, chaste, and full of kindness. His ambitions were noble and his aims and aspirations high. He was such a friend that time and separation mattered not; his friend knew at all times that he could be depended on and that he would only do what was right.

He was a lawyer of wide information and knowledge of law. He was faithful to the interests of his clients, and he won the confidence of all by his high ideal of justice and right. His well-trained mind was analytical, his reasoning logical, and his conclusions just. He was an able lawyer, a credit to the bar, and an honor to his profession.

As a Christian he was baptized and had an abiding faith in the wisdom, justice, love, and mercy of his Maker. He well performed his duty to his neighbor and in his life exemplified the golden rule:

Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you.

As a public man he was broad in his views and had a ready grasp of national affairs. He was no demagogue, but at all times a loyal advocate and an outspoken champion of the principles for which he stood. No selfish ambition ever kept him silent or made him swerve from his duty to his people. His character and mind were well balanced, conservative, but bold. If he had one trait of character that impressed one more than another, it was his strict integrity. MALLORY'S honesty was known, admired, and esteemed throughout the length and breadth of Florida.

A prince can mak' a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that,
But an honest man's aboon his might.

STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY was an honest man, the noblest work of God.

As a citizen, a soldier, and a statesman he freely gave to Florida and the nation his best efforts. He was earnest, diligent, and faithful to every trust reposed in him. His spotless life and character without stain is his best monument, and to succeeding generations will illuminate the path to duty and to honor.

And now that his life work is over, his body rests beneath the sod of his loved Florida. The Southern sun, which warmed his heart to love of his native State and filled it with patriotism, now with each returning springtime kisses into life and bloom the flowers that lovingly adorn his grave, and its too warm rays to them as tempered by the soft, balmy Southern breezes from across the Mexic Sea, which he loved so well, and his slumber is soothed by the requiem of its rippling waves; for he is not dead, but sleepeth, his pure soul having risen, until resurrection's dawn, to rest on high in realms of eternal bliss with his Maker, for—

Death's but a path that must be trod,
If man would ever pass to God.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, late a Senator from the State of Florida, died in the city of Washington, Sunday, March 22, 1908. He was born October 10, 1876, near Fort Mason, Fla., and on his next birthday would have been but 32 years old. Only one Senator, I understand, began his career in this body at an earlier age, and none, I believe, with a promise of a more brilliant and useful future.

He was the son of Hon. John M. Bryan, a native of Hamilton County, Fla., who went in 1868 as a pioneer to Orange County, then a country without railroads, sparsely settled and devoid of many advantages, but which, under the influence of the sturdy pioneer, has since become one of the most prosperous and promising sections of the State. The father has filled many offices of trust in Florida, was a member of the legislature and a member of the railroad commission, and all his career has been marked with integrity and ability. Senator BRYAN'S mother was descended from the Huguenots—a people who gave up their native land and all of its ties and associations of home and kindred to find an asylum where they might worship God in their own way. Brave types were these. Each had a history of hardship, toil, peril, and privation, and the son of such a union could not fail if he toiled and endured in keeping with the ambitions and traditions of his ancestors.

Senator BRYAN was reared on his father's farm, and his early education was acquired in the Osceola High School at Kissimmee, near his home. He soon took rank as a faithful, diligent, and ambitious student. His vacations, as a rule, were spent in study, and he thus equipped himself for college. He entered Emory College at Oxford, Ga., at an early age, graduating with the degree of bachelor of arts. In his junior and senior years he was one of the ablest members of the debating team of the college, his election to the team being an unusual honor for one in his junior year. Having won his degree at Oxford, he taught school for a year at Monticello, Ga., and, after school hours, continued his studies, particularly in the law, which had become the guiding star of his ambition.

At the end of this period he entered Washington and Lee University, where his ability as a debater was quickly recognized, and he was chosen for the high honor of representing the university in the intercollegiate debate at Lexington, Va.

In June, 1899, he graduated from Washington and Lee with the degree of LL. B. and the proud distinction of completing the two years' course in one. Considering the double duty he thus exacted of himself as a student, it is a remarkable fact that he also won distinction among the champions in the athletic field, demonstrating thereby that he was still under the healthful spell of the woods and prairies of his Florida home.

Three months after graduating from Washington and Lee University he removed to Jacksonville, where he established himself in the practice of law and won at once the esteem and confidence of the people. He was regarded as an earnest worker and a clear and safe counselor, learned both in the law and the practical common sense of his father's fireside. His life was upright and correct. When he first went to Jacksonville he was practically a stranger, but soon made fast and firm friends and was especially popular among the young men. He joined their organizations and went into their athletic sports with zeal and enthusiasm. He won their confidence and held it throughout his short career in his adopted home.

Three years after his first going to Jacksonville he entered the political field as a candidate for county solicitor, and, after a vigorous and tireless campaign, won an overwhelming victory over his opponent, carrying every election precinct in the county except two. He entered upon the duties of the office in May, 1903. The legislature, then in session, passed stringent laws against Sunday saloons. Solicitor BRYAN gave notice that he would enforce the law and that all violators would be vigorously prosecuted, and he kept his word. He proceeded also against gambling, and within two years there was not known to be a gaming place in the city. He also instituted proceedings to compel delinquents to pay their licenses, filing in all nearly 2,000 informations, and was peculiarly vigorous in his prosecutions of what he regarded as combinations in restraint of trade. In 1904 he was a candidate as delegate from the State at large to the national Democratic convention, having been elected in the State primary by a very large and flattering vote. In 1906 he had no opposition for the nomination and election as county solicitor, and held this office until he was appointed to the United States Senate to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator MALLORY.

Before leaving for Washington to take up his duties as a member of this body, he said:

I shall accept the governor's commission, and I propose to justify his action in the minds of all fair-minded Democrats by as earnest, energetic, and unflagging devotion to the interests of the people of Florida as is humanly possible.

In 1904 there were several candidates before the Democratic primaries for governor of Florida, among them the Hon. N. B. Broward, the present governor of the State. The campaign in behalf of the governor was successfully directed by Senator BRYAN, and as there were strong and influential candidates in the race, the victory he won showed, for so young a man, a high evidence of political and executive ability. The friendship between him and the governor was close and strong, and when, on last Christmas day—a peculiarly fitting time—the latter offered Senator BRYAN the appointment to succeed Senator MALLORY, he acted only in keeping with the genius of such a friendship.

Senator BRYAN'S appointment was dated December 26, 1907, but he did not take his seat until January 9, 1908. He came to Washington just recovering from the grip, and a month later was attacked with typhoid fever. Although usually full of strength and vitality, he was so reduced that he was unable to combat the disease, and after a long illness, full of suffering, he died Sunday morning, March 22. The last ray of life light in his eyes rested upon the face of his young and devoted wife—the sweetheart of his college days, the light of his home, and the mother of his little son, and when he crossed over the brink into the glory of that other world it was her loving hand clasped in his that gave him comfort and courage in meeting the end.

I regard the death of Senator BRYAN as perhaps the saddest in the history of the Senate. Older men have passed away, but their course was run and their lives were finished and rounded to completeness with deeds done and laurels won. But here was a young man, rugged with the strength of the pioneer blood in his veins, handsome, magnetic, earnest, clean of thought, sturdy of character, and endowed with brilliant intellect—all the foundation of a life of great usefulness—cut down at the very threshold of his career. His passing away is one of those mysteries beyond our understanding, but into the wisdom of which it is not the province of good men to inquire.

Senator BRYAN entered upon the work of the Senate with the deepest interest. No important question was discussed upon which he did not, if necessary, burn the midnight oil that he might understand it in all its details. His legal training made him observant of every point of view; and although a partisan and holding steadfast to the principles of his party, he was generous in his belief that differences among right-thinking men were honest differences and born of convictions of what was right and wise and just.

The youth and promise of Senator BRYAN appealed to the kindly interest of the whole country. His reception in Washington by the Senate, by the President, by the people of the city, by the press, by high officials of the Departments, was generous in the extreme, and the memory of it will always be a source of pride and gratification to his kindred and the people of Florida.

His career here, while all too short, was long enough to impress all with his force, his earnestness, his purity of character, his high ideals, and his intense patriotism.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of my deceased colleagues, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 4, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, as I recall the situation, last evening just before the committee rose there was a point of order reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS]. I do not think that he withdrew the point.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I withdrew the point of order in view of the statements made by the chairman of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

For recording every assignment, agreement, power of attorney, or other paper of 300 words or under, $1; of over 300 and under 1,000 words, $2; and for each additional thousand words or fraction thereof, $1.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. Is this an increase in the cost in the Patent Office for furnishing copies?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not for copies; it is for recording.

Mr. MANN. That is the recording of applications?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Assignments.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certified copies of patents.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Assignments of patents.

Mr. TAWNEY. Assignments, I should say, of patents. I will say to the gentleman that when the present statute was enacted assignments of patents covered only a very few pages, if it covered more than one. The character of patents and the importance of patents has so changed and the documents used in the assignment of patents have so increased that the Government of the United States to-day is paying for the work of making these certified copies at least 100 per cent more than the people who receive these certified copies of patents pay for the service.

Mr. MANN. This is not for certified copies, I will say to the gentleman. What is now paid for recording and assignment of patents?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The same rates as these, except there is a maximum of $3, no matter how big it is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Depredations on public timber, protecting public lands, and settlement of claims for swamp land and swamp-land indemnity: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; of protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, and of adjusting claims for swamp lands, and indemnity for swamp lands, $500,000, to be immediately available, of which sum $250,000 is for the purpose of bringing up the work of the General Land Office hereunder so as to make the same current: Provided, That agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day each and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the proviso in this paragraph. I have no objection to that part allowing the per diem in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the part I suppose the gentleman objects to is allowing the Secretary of the Interior to appoint these agents.

Mr. MANN. Instead of having them appointed in the regular way.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the civil service. They are all appointed now by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Is there any special reason why that should be so?

Mr. TAWNEY. It always has been done, and because of the fact that the Department is not able to secure men possessing the qualifications that are necessary in the examination of these land quesions. These special agents have always been selected in this way.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I know they have always been selected in this way, and that is what I am complaining about. They have become political appointments instead of appointees selected for efficiency. They may be of value to some few Members of Congress, for aught I know.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not agree with the gentleman's statement that they are political appointments. I know personally they are not.

Mr. MANN. When I said they might be of value to some few Members of Congress I made a mistake. I think they are usually, so far as they do political work, in opposition to the Members of Congress from various districts. But they apply only to a few Congressional districts. These men ought to be experts as a rule. Some of them, at least, ought to be forestry experts. There are a number of forestry schools in the country from which it is easy to secure first-class men in reference to such matters.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] must necessarily know that the work of these special agents, who are appointed to make the investigations in regard to fraud upon the public domain, must necessarily be done by men not only of some legal attainments, but they must have some experience and some tact in order to conduct and transact the business for which they are employed. It requires a peculiar fitness, and it requires more or less experience in the administration of the public-land laws in order to qualify a man for the discharge of the duties in this position.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly it.

Mr. TAWNEY. And it is because of this fact that these agents have never been classified, and have always been appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been found absolutely necessary in the experience of the office in the adminstration of the public-land laws to have men appointed in this way.

Mr. MANN. So far as the men who are now in the service are concerned, if it is desired to retain them in the service, that can be done in a very simple way by the President covering them into the classified service, which undoubtedly would be done and done properly. The Secretary of the Interior himself is a former Commissioner of Civil Service. He does not believe in this system of political appointments, and I can see no reason why Congress should force him to make appointments in a way that he does not believe he ought to exercise.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, Congress is not forcing him. He has asked for this authority, and he asked it, notwithstanding his experience as a former Commissioner of the Civil Service. He asks it because of his knowledge of the qualifications of men obtained through the Civil Service Commission, and his knowledge of the necessary qualifications of men capable of performing this particular service. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, the Land Office is very much in arrears in the investigation of these claims. What they want and what the Secretary of the Interior recommended was this increase of appropriation for general purposes. In the judgment of the committee they thought that this additional force should be limited to the work that has now accumulated, and when the work is up current then the size of the force of special agents will again drop back to where it has always been and where they can keep the work up current hereafter. They are to be employed on the work that is now awaiting the action of the Interior Department. When before the committee the Secretary said this:

> A special agent now must be a man of vigor, for he very often has to walk on the trail 25 or 26 miles a day if he can not get any other way of transit. If he is not in a country that is wooded, he may be able to get a buggy, and there he may have to drive 50 miles a day and put up with discomfort. We want men learned in the law so far as possible, because they have to appear before registers and receivers and conduct these cases. Then we must have men who are gentlemen, because there is nothing that hurts the service more than to get hold of a man who is a bulldozer, one who may go up to a homesteader and say, "You can not get your claim." That hurst the service and we do not stand for it. We are trying to get a class of young, bright, active fellows.

Now, those are some of the reasons why the Secretary of the Interior recommended that he be permitted to appoint these men. Then he can select from among the applicants, knowing the character of the service, knowing the duties they will have to perform. Knowing these things, he is far better qualified to make an examination as to the fitness of the applicants than the Civil Service Commission; and it is in the interest of the public service that this discretion be given to the Secretary in the matter of the appointment of these men, whose employment is absolutely necessary to get the work up current in order that the homesteaders now waiting for the final adjustment of their claims may secure their titles.

Mr. MANN. Does the Secretary of the Interior state that in his opinion he can not secure proper officials in the ordinary manner of appointment through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that he states specifically that he can not get the men. I infer from statements that they can not. My statement is based also upon the fact that while employees in every branch of the public service have been covered into the classified service, these men, because of the peculiar character of their work, have never been classified. This, I infer, would have been, had it been believed the men required could be obtained through the civil service.

Mr. BONYNGE. Are you certain that is true as to the men who are now in that service?

Mr. TAWNEY. The special agents are not now in the classified service.

Mr. BONYNGE. Are not those now in that service in the classified service?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they are not, and never have been in the classified service.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman state there is any difficulty in securing the number needed from the classified service?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not been possible heretofore, or it has been believed to be impossible, to get men from the classified roll, in the judgment of those who have it in their power to classify the men if they see fit to do so.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman knows as well, or better than I do, that there is a tendency on the part of Government officials everywhere where they can appoint special agents to travel around, to try to make special appointments.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It has been carried in this way for about ten years.

Mr. MANN. I know, and I made the point of order on this nearly ten years ago, and it went out on the point of order. It went over to the Senate and it came back with this on it, and it was agreed to by the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. And by the House.

Mr. MANN. Agreed to because—well, I will not say that is the reason, but probably would have been agreed to by the House anyhow. Now, some Members may be interested in some of these agents; I do not know, I doubt that, but that is no reason why the Government should be constantly put in a position, and the House be constantly put in the position of requiring a civil-service reformer—and I say that with all respect, because I have a very great admiration for the Secretary of the Interior—to violate everything he has ever said on the subject, in the appointment of some special agents when you can get all you want by civil-service examination. The Commissioners could ask the Secretary of the Interior to prepare the examination questions, to prepare all of the information that is to be furnished by the applicant, the character of the application, and yet they say they want Congress to assume the burden of violating the sentiment and morale of the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take into consideration the fact that the character of this service is temporary. It is not intended to keep these men employed regularly, but they have got behind with their work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think 180,000 cases.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] say that this is temporary work—

> To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; of protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriations—

Is that temporary work as long as we have the public domain?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, no; I do not say so, but I do say this, that, "of the sum appropriated, $250,000 is for the purpose of bringing up the work of the General Land Office hereunder so as to make the same current." Now, that language was put in there by the committee for the special purpose of their not hereafter coming to Congress after the work is up current and claiming that they had so much the year before and therefore they must have this much next year. Now, we want to give them what service is necessary to bring their work up current, and then when that work is brought up current Congress will have the power to again reduce their appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I would be willing to make an agreement with the gentleman, if this temporary—and that is all the gentleman is figuring about, namely, to have these appointees for the temporary appropriation made by the Secretary of the Interior—I would be willing to make an agreement to withdraw the point of order if next year, when the temporary appropriation goes out, the authority to make appointment for the permanent work is also taken away from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] had the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen had five minutes apiece, and it is all gone.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not intended that this authority shall apply to any except those that are necessary to bring the work up current. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to put my judgment in this particular matter up against the Committee on Appropriations, although I want to say I think it is simply rotten that Congress should be constantly called upon to require Department officials to make appointments outside of the civil-service law when those same officials are constantly criticising Congress for its attitude in opposing civil-service reform and holding themselves up as high and mighty prophets of civil-service reform. I think that if the appointment of men under the civil-service law is good for one branch of the service under John Smith, it is good for another branch of the service under John Jones, and there ought to be no distinction made. But, in view of the particular temporary character of this work, as explained, I will withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Examinations of desert lands: The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $1,000 made by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine, during the fiscal year 1906, under such regulations and at such compensation as he may prescribe, the desert lands selected by the States under the provisions of section 4 of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1894, is hereby continued and made available for expenditure in such examinations that may be made during the fiscal year 1909: Provided, That if such examinations be made by detailed clerks or employees of the Department, they shall be entitled to actual necessary expenses of transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares, and not exceeding $3 per day in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the gentleman whether this paragraph refers to examination of desert lands selected under the Carey Act?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; those are the examinations made under the Carey Act. This reads:

Provided, That if such examinations be made by detailed clerks or employees in the Department, they shall be entitled to actual necessary expenses of transportation, including sleeping-car fares.

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. How much is the appropriation? One thousand dollars?

Mr. TAWNEY. One thousand dollars; yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman's committee take into consideration the adequateness of this appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. There has been practically nothing expended under the appropriation for the last two or three years.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is very likely. Mr. Chairman, the State of Idaho has already received 1,000,000 acres under the Carey Act, and they brought a proposition before Congress to give that State 2,000,000 acres more under the Carey Act, with the proposition to give various other States a large amount of acreage under the Carey Act. No Government official knows whether the Carey Act is being observed by the State of Idaho or the other States or not. There is no examination made by the Government to ascertain whether this desert land turned over to these States is being irrigated in accordance with the provisions of the Carey Act or not.

Now, it seems to me that when the Government is carrying on great irrigation works on the one hand itself, and then offering to turn over lands which will become of great value since irrigation has become a known success, turning over great quantities of acreage of land to States on the basis that they shall in some way cause the land to be irrigated, the Government ought to have an examination to ascertain whether these laws are being carried into effect or not. When the State of Idaho or any other State may be making contracts with some corporation for the sale of some several hundred thousand acres of land for irrigation, we ought to know whether the land is being irrigated before we vote additional acreage.

Here is an unexpended balance of $1,000 proposed. No portion of it has been expended for several years for the Government to ascertain whether this enormous acreage of land now proposed to be taken from the Government is taken under conditions which the Government intended to have fulfilled.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman in regard to the administration of the Carey Act. I believe that there should be some investigation by the proper committee of the House having jurisdiction of public lands and public-land laws and their honest administration. I will say, further, that if it is not done before the Committee on Appropriations considers this estimate again it will be done by that committee.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that when before the committee the Secretary said in reply to this inquiry:

The CHAIRMAN. You omit the item for examination of desert lands?

Mr. GARFIELD. I found out about that to-day. It simply asks for the reappropriation of the unexpended balance. The thousand dollars has not been expended that was appropriated in 1906. It is for desert-land entries under the Carey Act. So far it has not been needed within the last two years. There are some Carey Act cases coming in, and we may need that during the next year, so if you will leave the reappropriation of the unexpended balance, striking out the brackets, simply as it was last year, we will be glad.

As a matter of fact, they had recommended dropping this item entirely until the attention of the Secretary was brought to the fact by the committee at the time of the hearing.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, since these bills were reported in giving to Idaho 1,000,000 acres additional as passed by the Senate, reported to the House to give the State of Idaho 2,000,000 acres more, various other States it is proposed to give large acreage to. I have made some casual investigation as to what the Department is doing in reference to it, and my information has been that the Department has made no examination as to whether these States are carrying out the Carey law, because they have no money to begin with. A thousand dollars, of course, would be a mere bagatelle.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is nobody to blame except the Department for that. They got all they estimated for.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticising the Committee on Appropriations, but calling the attention of the committee to this proposition, which is a pretty live wire, that we are asked to turn over a million acres of land to a half dozen or more Western States, in which we are carrying on at great expense irrigation plants, in order to permit these States to turn over to corporations as much as 100,000 acres of land, when we will not turn over more than 160 or more than 40 acres to one individual. It strikes me it is something that is worthy of attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Restoration of lands in forest reserves: To enable the Secretary of the Interior to meet the expenses of advertising the restoration to the public domain of lands in forest reserves, or of lands temporarily withdrawn for forest-reserve purposes, $12,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that paragraph in order to ascertain what it means.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read what Mr. Dennett said when before the committee, on page 330 of the hearings:

The chairman asked him this question:

The next item is "Restoration of lands in forest reserves." Your current appropriation is $2,000, and you ask for $8,000 for the next year. You had a deficiency appropriation of $10,000 for the current year.

Mr. DENNETT. We have now pending in the office 1,000 lists, applications for homesteads within forest reserves. That takes about $8 a list. We will use up all of the $10,000 that you gave us in January, and I presume it is reasonable to suppose that we will have over 1,000 next year. We could use the smaller appropriation and then come in for a deficiency, if you think that would be better.

Now, under the law these homestead entries are made within forest reserves, and the advertising that this appropriation is intended to provide for is directed by law to be made.

Mr. PERKINS. At the same time I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the next item, $18,000, for the furnishing of transcripts.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is for the Land Office.

Mr. PERKINS. What are they taken for?

Mr. TAWNEY. They furnish a transcript and record, and it is furnished to persons who buy the land, or for the use of the Government. It produces an amount that is more than the amount expended by the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveys and resurveys of public lands, $425,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines: Provided, That in expending this appropriation preference shall be given, first, in favor of surveying townships occupied, in whole or in part, by actual settlers and of lands granted to the States by the acts approved February 22, 1889, and the acts approved July 3 and July 10, 1890; and, second to surveying under such other acts as provide for land grants to the several States and Territories, except railroad land grants and such indemnity lands as the several States and Territories may be entitled to in lieu of lands granted them for educational and other purposes which may have been sold or included in some reservation or otherwise disposed of, and other surveys shall be confined to lands adapted to agriculture and lines of reservations, and lands within boundaries of forest reservations, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth rates not exceeding $13 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $11 for township and $7 for section lines, and in cases of exceptional difficulties in the surveys, where the work can not be contracted for at these rates, compensation for surveys and resurveys may be allowed by the said Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, at rates not exceeding $18 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $15 for township and $12 for section lines: Provided further, That in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and the district of Alaska there may be allowed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, rates not exceeding $25 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $23 for township and $20 for section lines; the provisions of section 2411, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing allowance for surveys in California and Oregon, are hereby extended to all of the above-named States and Territories and district. And of the sum hereby appropriated there may be expended such an amount as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may deem necessary for examination of public surveys in the several surveying districts, by such competent surveyors as the Secretary of the Interior may select, or by such competent surveyors as he may authorize the surveyor-general to select, at such compensation, not exceeding $6 per day, except in the district of Alaska, where a compensation not exceeding $10 per day may be allowed one such surveyor and such per diem allowance, in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $3, while engaged in field examinations, as he may prescribe, said per diem allowance to be also made to such clerks who are competent surveyors who may be detailed to make field examinations, in order to test the accuracy of the work in the field, and to prevent payment for fraudulent and imperfect surveys returned by deputy surveyors, and for examinations of surveys heretofore made and reported to be defective or fraudulent, and inspecting mineral deposits, coal fields, and timber districts, and for making, by such competent surveyors, fragmentary surveys and such other surveys or examinations as may be required for identification of lands for purposes of evidence in any suit or proceeding in behalf of the United States: Provided further, That the sum of not exceeding $25,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purchase of metal monuments to be used for public-land survey corners wherever practicable.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that part of the paragraph just read, commencing with line 24, page 73, and extending down to and including line 16, on page 75. It extends special privileges to certain States in so far as special prices for surveys will extend them.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas kindly state his point of order?

Mr. MACON. The paragraph makes a change in existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suggest that the gentleman's point of order ought to extend only from line 24, on page 73, to line 13, on page 74, to the word "district." The balance of it is not subject to a point of order, while that part that I have mentioned undoubtedly is, because the rates allowed there are in excess of the statutory rates. The reason for the excess is stated in the paragraph. If the gentleman includes all that he has stated, I shall oppose the point of order.

Mr. MACON. As I understand it, the whole paragraph is subject to a point of order. If there are any parts of it that are based upon existing law, then the chairman of the committee can offer such parts as an amendment to the bill; but all being together, and being a part and parcel of the whole, with the illegal features embodied in it, the whole paragraph, as I understand it, becomes subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order against the whole paragraph?

Mr. MACON. I make the point of order against the part of the paragraph beginning with line 24.

Mr. TAWNEY. Beginning with the words "Provided further."

Mr. MACON. Beginning with "Provided further," on page 73, and extending throughout page 74, down to and including line 16, on page 75.

Mr. TAWNEY. I submit that the point of order is not well taken against that part of the paragraph. The gentleman does not make a point of order to the entire paragraph, and the point does not lie against that part to which he has made the point, for the reason that after the word "district," in line 13, the Chairman will observe that there is a limitation upon the expenditure of the appropriation for surveying:

And of the sum hereby appropriated there may be expended such an amount as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may deem necessary for examination of public surveys in the several surveying districts, by such competent surveyors as the Secretary of the Interior may select, or by such competent surveyors as he may authorize the surveyor-general to select, at such compensation, not exceeding $6 per day, except in the district of Alaska.

And then follows the rate of compensation which he shall not exceed. Then the proviso at the end of the paragraph—

Provided further, That the sum of not exceeding $25,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purchase of metal monuments to be used for public land survey corners wherever practicable.

Now, these surveys are authorized by law. Also the monuments are authorized by law, but the character of the monument is not described. This appropriation is made for the purchase and establishment of metal monuments, instead of the monuments that have heretofore been used. It would be entirely competent to make a specific appropriation for these monuments. Instead of doing that, however, we segregate so much of the appropriation and make it available for the purchase of these metal monuments, which are authorized by law. So I say that from line 13 to the end of that paragraph it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MACON. Line 13 on what page?

Mr. TAWNEY. Pages 74 and 75. From line 13 to the word "district," on page 74, including all of page 75, is a limitation on the total appropriation, and the other part is an appropriation of money which the law authorizes.

Mr. MANN. How far does the point of order of the gentleman from Arkansas go?

Mr. TAWNEY. He extends it clear from the bottom of page 73 to the end of the paragraph, on page 75.

Mr. MACON. To the end of the paragraph, on page 75, including line 16.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to prevent the use of metal monuments in place of the stone monuments? That is the last proviso.

Mr. MACON. The part of it which I mainly contend against is contrary to existing law. Beginning with "Provided further," at line 24, on page 73, it reads:

That in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and the district of Alaska there may be allowed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, rates not exceeding $25 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $23 for township and $20 for section lines; the provisions of section 2411, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing allowance for surveys in California and Oregon, are hereby extended to all of the above-named States and Territories and district.

If that is not a change of existing law, then I do not understand what it would take to make a change of law. It extends opportunities for surveying lands in certain States that they do not have under existing law, and hence must be a change of existing law.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Arkansas will permit. The gentleman from Minnesota concedes that that portion which the gentleman from Arkansas has just read is subject to a point of order. May I inquire whether he cares to make the point of order on the balance of the paragraph?

Mr. MACON. Beginning on line 13, page 74, the paragraph reads as follows:

And of the sum hereby appropriated there may be expended such an amount as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may deem necessary for examination of public surveys in the several surveying districts, by such competent surveyors as the Secretary of the Interior may select, or by such competent surveyors as he may authorize the surveyor-general to select, at such compensation, not exceeding $6 per day, except in the district of Alaska, where a compensation not exceeding $10 per day may be allowed one such surveyor, and such per diem allowance, in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $3, while engaged in field examinations, as he may prescribe, said per diem allowance to be also made to such clerks who are competent surveyors who may be detailed to make field examinations, in order to test the accuracy of the work in the field, and to prevent payment for fraudulent and imperfect surveys returned by deputy surveyors, and for examinations of surveys heretofore made and reported to be defective or fraudulent, and inspecting mineral deposits, coal fields, and timber districts, and for making, by such competent surveyors, fragmentary surveys and such other surveys or examinations as may be required for identification of lands for purposes of evidence in any suit or proceeding in behalf of the United States.

So it is not necessary for me to point out to one who is so well informed as the present occupant of the chair that this is a change of existing law. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to call the attention of the Chair and also of my friend from Arkansas to the fact that this paragraph appropriates $425,000 at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for townships, and $5 for section lines. Here is an appropriation of $425,000, under which the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, will make these public surveys. If you strike out the language as proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, there is no limitation whatever on the amount that the Secretary of the Interior can pay to these people that are employed by him in making these surveys authorized and appropriated for. The language that the gentleman proposes to strike out, from line 13 to the end of the paragraph, removes every possible limitation that the paragraph places upon the expenditure of the total sum appropriated for making public surveys. I do not think the gentleman from Arkansas wants to increase the discretion of the executive officers in the expenditure of $425,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, after the statement of the chairman I will withdraw the point of order as to all that part beginning with the word "and," in line 13, page 74, to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas in that connection—I think the gentleman's point of order is well taken as to the whole paragraph—but the gentleman will notice that line 6, page 74, the provision in reference to the payment for services in certain States and Territories is at a rate not exceeding $25 per linear mile.

Now, it goes without saying that the cost in making a survey over a mountain is more per linear mile than it is for making a survey over a prairie. As I understand the law, there is no limitation now upon the amount that the Secretary of the Interior may pay for these mountain surveys, and here is the total of the appropriation, a sum appropriated; and while I think it subject to a point of order, I fully agree with the gentleman about that, still this is, in fact, a limitation upon the amount which the Secretary of the Interior may pay for this mountain service.

Mr. MACON. It allows greater pay for surveying in these States than is allowed for surveys in other States.

Mr. MANN. That is because the conditions are different; it is a mountainous condition. I think this provision only applies to the States where are situated the Rocky Mountains. They are named in this way merely as a matter of convenience, because it is a better description to name certain States than to say in States where the Rocky Mountains prevail, and it is intended to be not an extension of authority to the Secretary of the Interior, but a limitation of the amount which he may pay. I know that if I am correct in that view, and the gentleman from Arkansas should concur in that view, he would think that the provision ought to be in the bill and not go out.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some question whether these provisions are subject to a point of order, but I hope in any event that the gentleman from Arkansas will not insist on the point of order. I will say to the gentleman that this provision has been in the bill for many, many years, and that, without this provision, the Secretary of the Interior has authority to let contracts, without limit as to cost, and the expense might be much greater in some cases than provided for in this paragraph. If he has not that authority, then it would be utterly impossible to get the service in a mountainous country. These higher prices are very rarely paid, but it is necessary to pay them in some instances in order to have surveys executed in a very rough, mountainous country.

Without this provision a contract let for the survey of a township some portion of which might be level would stop at the base of the mountains and the township would be left partially unsurveyed if there was no opportunity for increasing the rate for the survey of such land. I think there have been few cases where it has been claimed that an excessive price has been paid for public-land surveys. I have heard of few such complaints. I think the public-land surveys which are executed under competitive bids are generally executed at low rates, and the gentleman does not certainly desire to leave the statute in such form that it would be impossible to execute necessary surveys. If there had been any improper payments or extravagancies under this provision, it seems as though there might be some reason for striking it out; but I think the gentleman has heard of none such. I certainly have never heard any complaint, and when it is stricken out it is a question whether or not the Secretary may not pay in a given case a still higher rate.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says appeals to me, but I notice that provision is made in a part of this paragraph which precedes the part I make the point of order against, which provides for survey or resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth for a higher pay than for ordinary land surveys. On page 73, line 11, beginning with the word "except," we find the following language:

Except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth rates not exceeding $13 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $11 for township and $7 for section lines, and in cases of exceptional difficulties in the surveys, where the work can not be contracted for at these rates, compensation for surveys and resurveys may be allowed by the said Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, at rates not exceeding $18 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $15 for township and $12 for section lines.

That provides for a survey of mountainous lands. That provision allows the Commissioner to contract for surveys at a special price, but this proviso that I object to goes on to state that in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and the district of Alaska, there may be allowed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth rates not exceeding $25 per linear mile, for standard and meander lines. That extends a special privilege in the matter of the survey of the lands in these particular States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I am addressing myself to a point of order, but the Chair, of course, can say when my time for doing that has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for a moment. I want to call his attention to the fact, as did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the States named are mountainous States.

Mr. MACON. But this provides for surveys in mountainous territory where the timber is heavy and the undergrowth is thick.

Mr. MONDELL. It provides for the survey in the ordinary mountainous regions of the country.

Mr. MACON. But it does not say the ordinary mountainous regions of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. This other provision Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must know is intended to cover those exceedingly rough mountainous regions that occur only in the Rocky Mountains, and there are some lands included in surveys that can not be surveyed even at these rates profitably, and yet if you do not allow for these extremely difficult conditions it may be utterly impossible to complete the survey of a township.

The gentleman understands, of course, that these rates are not paid over all the territory included in any contract, but only where the field notes of the surveyor, made under oath, and the report of the Government examiner following him, made under oath, are to the effect that the conditions referred to in this paragraph exist. In other words, conditions where it is almost impossible to carry a chain, where it is almost impossible under ordinary conditions to project a line, and so difficult are some of these surveys that efforts have been made in the past to secure legislation allowing the projection of a line by other methods than by chaining, but Congress has not seen fit to do that. But you reach oftentimes in a survey, a survey coming within the first classification, a limited territory where it is utterly impossible to survey except at the high rate.

Mr. MACON. Then, if the gentleman will permit me, I will state that I do not think that character of territory worth surveying, and for that reason no price ought to be paid for it. If it is so impossible to survey land as that, a band of surveyors with chain carriers and so on can hardly get over the territory to be surveyed, I do not see how it can be utilized after it is surveyed.

Mr. MONDELL. A condition of that kind may exist only for a mile or two or three miles, and then territory is reached of a character that can be surveyed at lower rates, at the minimum or intermediate rates; and, surely, it is not economy to drop a survey at a point like that and then take it up from another direction at extra expense and carry it on.

Mr. MACON. Let them take the bad with the good. We all have to do that, no matter what kind of a task we are performing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas make the point of order?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order beginning with line 24, page 73, and ending with the word "district," in line 13, on page 74.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that portion against which the point of order is made, beginning with the word "provided," line 24, on page 73, and ending with the word "district," line 13, page 74, is a substantive proposition, and the point of order would lie against it without destroying or taking out the remainder of the paragraph. The Chair further thinks that that portion of the paragraph against which the point of order is made is subject to the point of order, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. TAWNEY. The point of order is only from the beginning of the proviso to the word "district," in line 13, page 74.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MACON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Office of the Director of the Geological Survey: For Director, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,500; chief disbursing clerk, $2,500; librarian, $2,000; photographer, $2,000; three assistant photographers, one at $900, one at $720, and one at $480; one clerk of class 2; three clerks of class 1; one clerk, $1,000; four clerks, at $900 each; four copyists, at $720 each; watchman, $840; four watchmen, at $600 each; janitor, $600; four messengers, at $480 each; in all, $35,340.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested by several Members to pass the remaining paragraphs under the head of United States Geological Survey, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that they may go over until Monday immediately following the House going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NORRIS. Extending how far?

Mr. TAWNEY. All appropriations under the title of the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. MANN. Commencing with "Scientific assistants of the Geological Survey."

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; down to "Miscellaneous objects, Department of the Interior," on page 80. It begins with line 17, page 76, and goes to the top of page 80, including lines 1 and 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that that portion of the bill included between line 17, page 76, and line 3, on top of page 80, having reference to the Geological Survey, be passed until next Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if that will be taken up as soon as we go into the Committee of the Whole House on Monday?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what I said.

Mr. NORRIS. That was the request the gentleman from Minnesota made, that it be taken up immediately after going into the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Immediately upon the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The first thing on Monday. The Chair adds that to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. That will include all amendments relating to the Geological Survey, examination of structural materials, and so forth?

Mr. TAWNEY. All are included in that.

Mr. MANN. And will come up at that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. All are included in that reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was necessarily absent from the House when the items of depredation on public timber, and so forth, page 69, were discussed, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have ten minutes to discuss that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman's request would take the committee back to that paragraph. If it is for the purpose of offering an amendment——

Mr. MONDELL. I have no intention of offering an amendment; I simply desire to discuss the question. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to discuss that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress, in a discussion of this item, I opposed an increase of the appropriation above $250,000. This item provides for agents and others employed to protect the public timber, examine depredations on public timber, for the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry, and so forth. I have not opposed the increase of appropriation this year, and have, in fact, favored it, for the reason that I am assured that the increase is a temporary one, and that it is necessary to clean up the cases now before the Land Office. Mr. Chairman, had a sane and reasonable policy been pursued with regard to the public lands in the past this increase of $250,000 would have been entirely unnecessary; but, unfortunately, several years ago it was the policy of the Department to suspend land entries on the most flimsy pretext. The slightest suggestion, whether of a character entitling it to consideration or not, has been quite sufficient to suspend land entries by the thousand.

The slightest whisper wafted into the General Land Office or to a special agent, anonymous communications of all sorts and kinds, have been considered sufficient to suspend the entries of settlers, and the Department now declines to pass these cases which arose before the administration of the present Secretary until there can be a special examination in the field of the cases which have been thus suspended. Of course it will develop that 95 per cent or a greater per cent of these complaints have no foundation whatever, that they are the result of spite or pique, or of the effort of Government agents themselves to perpetuate their employment by raising questions as to the validity and legality of entries. But those of us who live in the public-land States have grown weary of constantly and continually importuning the Department to make examinations and relieve entries from suspension, and inasmuch as the Department has assured us that if given this additional fund it will be used for the purpose, not of attempting to create new cases, but to settle the old cases, and inasmuch as we are confident that the present Secretary of the Interior is honestly anxious to clean up the old cases, to relieve them from suspension, and does not desire to continue the policy of his predecessor of suspending entries upon the slightest pretense, the slightest suspicion as to their legality, we feel that the increase ought to be had, and we hope that we will not be disappointed as to the manner in which it will be used.

Those who do not live in public-land States can not understand how trying are the conditions existing in regions where settlers are attempting to secure titles from the Government and where, though an entryman may have complied with all the provisions of law, his title may be withheld one year, two years, three years, or indefinitely, upon an absolutely unsupported or anonymous communication wafted into the Land Office, or some malicious whisper coming to the ear of an overzealous official of the Government. We want to have these cases cleaned up, and we do hope that the men appointed to that work will not attempt to perpetuate their service by creating new cases with as little foundation as the majority of the cases that now stand upon the books of the General Land Office.

Mr. Chairman, while discussing this matter I want to refer very briefly to the provisions contained at the bottom of page 75, providing for special surveys in Utah. I wish simply to say that I have no doubt that those surveys are necessary, and I certainly do not desire to raise my voice in opposition to that appropriation. I hope that the committee in the future will not continue this practice of dividing the survey appropriation. I believe that it is a very unwise practice. If this is to become the rule, then every Member of Congress from a public-land State must become engaged in a scramble for surveys for his own State and district. The appropriation for land surveys should all be contained in the one lump-sum appropriation, and should be divided in accordance with the necessities of the situation by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the law, among the States containing public lands and requiring surveys.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yosemite National Park, California: For protection and improvement of the Yosemite National Park, and the construction of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement of roads, other than toll roads, $30,000.

Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 80 for the purpose of offering an amendment to the following:

Education in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, to provide for the education and support of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska; for erection, repair, and rental of school buildings; for text-books and industrial apparatus; for pay and necessary traveling expenses of all persons employed hereunder outside of Washington, D. C., including general agent, assistant agent, superintendents, teachers, physicians, and other employees, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, $175,000: Provided, That any person or persons employed hereunder as special agents or inspectors, or to perform any special or unusual duty in connection herewith, shall not receive as compensation exceeding $200 per month, in addition to actual traveling expenses and per diem not exceeding $4 in lieu of subsistence, when absent on duty from their designated and actual posts of duty.

I was not on the floor for a minute, and did not notice that we had passed it. I ask unanimous consent to return for the purpose of offering a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 80, strike out all after the word "of," in line 21, down to and including the word "including," in line 23; and on page 81, after the word "duty," in line 9, insert:

"Provided, That of the sum hereby appropriated, not exceeding $7,000, may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia."

Mr. TAWNEY. That is in relation to the appropriation for education in Alaska. Heretofore they have had $10,000, and the committee omitted the item entirely, but upon investigation it was found they will need $7,000 of the amount carried in the amendment for the appropriation for education in Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. While the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is still on page 80, if the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] will yield, I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Minnesota. I wanted to inquire of the chairman about the provision made for the purchase of fifteen copies of volume 3 of the decisions of the——

Mr. TAWNEY. Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Company?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the name of a company. I will say to the gentleman that since I have looked it over again I see what the point is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 82, line 19, strike out "thirty thousand" and insert "fifty thousand."

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Does the chairman of the committee accept that?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the committee can not accept it. The amount recommended by the committee, after full investigation, is all that the committee felt Congress would be justified in appropriating for the Yosemite Park for the next fiscal year. I might say, respecting all these various national parks, that in view of the condition of the public revenue the committee thought if there was any one place in this bill where new construction and increased expenditure might properly be delayed it was here, and many of the items of the estimates for this park are of such a character as to be very doubtful about the wisdom of our making the improvements at any time. But, in any event, the committee felt that we would not be justified in going into elaborate expenditures for purposes that are not essential to the maintenance and administration of these parks.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this item. I do not desire to take up time to extol the beauties of Yosemite Park or the grandeur of its scenery. Ever since you were children you have read of the beauty and the grandeur of that place. Of all the places in the known world, Yosemite Valley stands unequaled for the grandeur of its scenery. For a long time this park has been almost inaccessible. But a year ago a railroad was completed to a point within 14 miles of the center of the valley, so that it is now easily accessible; and there is going to be a great deal of travel and a great many visitors to that valley, so that it certainly is the duty of the United States, when we are in possession of such a great natural wonder, to improve it for the use of the people of the United States.

Now, as a practical matter of business, the people of the United States in large numbers go to Europe for no other purpose than to enjoy themselves and to see scenery; and it is stated by people who are well posted on the subject, that there is somewhere from one hundred to two hundred million dollars spent annually in Europe by tourists from the United States. There is no reason why a large amount of this money should not be kept at home, and I consider it the duty of the United States Government to spend some money to properly make the great national parks accessible, so that they will be attractive, and keep the money that is going to foreign lands right here with us.

The Secretary of the Interior made a personal visit to Yosemite Park last year. He had reports made by engineers. Without my going into the merits of all the improvements in connection therewith, he recommended no less an amount than $240,000 that could be expended properly in the improvement of this park.

Knowing that such an amount would probably not meet with the approval of this House, I have simply asked for a small addition.

Mr. NEEDHAM and Mr. HARDY rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONGWORTH). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is an amendment pending or not. I wish to direct attention to another matter, and therefore I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will prevail. As my colleague has said, the estimates for this park for the coming fiscal year are more than $240,000. The committee has recommended but $30,000. It seems to me that my colleague has been exceedingly modest in asking that it be increased only $20,000. I visited Yosemite for the third time last fall, and I want to say that the roads in that park are in horrible condition. Really, at this time it is exceedingly trying to travel over those roads. They need improvement very, very much, and this additional amount is requested for the purpose of improving principally the roads within Yosemite Valley proper. Since the building of the railroad the travel has increased perhaps three-fold to this national park, and the coming year will probably witness more people going to the Yosemite National Park than ever before in its history. It is not necessary to extol the beauties of this national park as a playground of the nation. It is not necessary to tell the Members of this House of the beauties that can be seen there. It should be the policy of the Government to make it accessible and to make a trip there a trip of pleasure. As it is now, the roads being so bad, it detracts from the pleasure of the trip. I sincerely hope this modest amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the committee understands exactly the situation in regard to this amendment with reference to this park. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have never heretofore appropriated for this park in excess of $6,000, except for the current year, when the appropriation is $30,000, which is due to the fact that the Government has taken over again from the State of California the entire area included in the original Yosemite Park.

Now, the amount allowed for the next fiscal year is the same as the amount allowed for the current year. That is for the maintenance of the roads and the various buildings in the park that are owned by the Government, and also for the salaries of superintendents and assistants and laborers; and in addition to the $30,000 they get all the revenue derived from the concession which the Government has granted, which amounts in the aggregate to about $15,000 a year. The committee think that if there is any branch of the Government service that can wait for extension and improvement, as proposed in the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior for this park, it is the national parks of the United States. And in refusing to allow the increase there is no danger of the property deteriorating or that the park will not be maintained in the same condition in which it has been maintained heretofore and is being maintained during the current fiscal year. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. GILLETT. Did the committee consider the question of purchasing any roads in the park?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There was no such proposition before the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. There was no such proposition before the committee and there is no authority for the purchase of any road in this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Division!

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 20, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose mainly of making an inquiry, but I move to strike out the last word for that purpose. I see here an appropriation for the purchase of necessary food for buffaloes and salary of a buffalo keeper in the Yellowstone Park, $2,500. My recollection is that in going nearly all over that park some years ago we saw but one buffalo, and he was fenced in on an island in Yellowstone Lake, and we paid a little commission for the purpose of seeing him to the alleged owner of the boat on the lake and of the buffalo on the island. If there are any buffaloes that belong to the Government, they must have gone there since my visit some years ago, and I do not believe they ought to be there if they are there at the expense of the Government. It is a cold climate, uninhabitable by men during most of the year, unless they are very well protected, and if this is an annual expenditure of $2,500 for the exhibition of one buffalo on an island in Yellowstone Lake, it seems to me it is rather expensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Evidently the gentleman did not visit any other part of the Yellowstone Park than the part he has just referred to, the island. If he had, he would know that this appropriation is for the herd of buffalo near the Hot Springs reservation in the park. The buffalo that is referred to by the gentleman, I think, is a private enterprise maintained for private profit, and there is no appropriation for the maintenance of any buffalo on the island in Yellowstone Lake, but we have a large herd of buffaloes in that park, for which herd this appropriation is made.

Mr. HARDY. Is that herd away from the usual course of tourists?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; it is not. The gentleman must have been asleep when he was driving up from the Hot Springs Hotel or he would have seen it, because the herd is right there in plain sight. Anybody can see it if he is awake when he drives along there.

Mr. HARDY. I must have gone by another route, but I thought I was informed that the buffalo on the island was the only gentleman of that character in the park. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Evidently the gentleman himself was buffaloed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. It has been suggested by gentlemen who do not know as much as I do about it to ask how many there are in the herd.

Mr. TAWNEY. Our information is that there are about 300 in the herd.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are so many that they have asked me several times to allow a division of them, and the putting of them in different places, because there are too many to have in one place.

Mr. HARDY. I was in search of information, and I have obtained it. It was some years ago I was there, and these must have been put there since.

The Clerk read as follows:

Crater Lake National Park, Oregon: For protection and improvement of the Crater Lake National Park, and repairing and extension of roads, $3,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 83, strike out the words "three thousand" and insert "four thousand three hundred."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to increase the amount appropriated for the Crater Lake National Park in Oregon from $3,000 to $4,300. The reasons for that increase are as follows: First, there is a considerable travel into the park during the summer, and the present roads should be put into condition to accommodate that travel and proper extensions made. Another reason is that the roads across the land now embraced in the park have been for many years the natural outlets for central Oregon, including the driving out of stock. By making this a national park the Government has obstructed this natural thoroughfare. Since the park has been included in the forest reserve and made a national park all the maintenance of the roads devolves upon the General Government, and I was told when I was in that vicinity last summer, by gentlemen interested in business, it was difficult to get stock across, and that considerable improvements should be made. However, I am asking only a very modest amount at this time.

The committee has appropriated $3,000; $1,000 as salary of the superintendent, $480 for two park rangers, $200 for emergency expenses, and $365 for the keep of a horse, leaving $955 for improvements and extension of the roads and for the maintenance of bridges, many of which are, as I am told, in a dangerous condition. The sum recommended by the Committee on Appropriations is altogether insufficient. The Secretary of the Interior, who visited this region last summer, asked for $10,845 for this park, and some of the improvements that that amount was intended to pay for are these: There should be $400 for the improvement of a road from the south line of the park to the post-office, $600 for improvement of the road from the west line of the park to the post-office, $500 for improvement of the road from the post-office to the rim of the crater, and $500 for the repairs of bridges. There is another small item of $250 for the repair of the road within the rim of the crater. Crater Lake is located within the top of an extinct volcano and is of most imposing grandeur and one of the greatest scenic wonders of this country, but the principal reason for asking this small increase of $1,300 at this time is for the maintenance and improvement of the roads and bridges through the park, making reasonably available a natural outlet from central Oregon, and I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the amount which the committee has recommended, $3,000, is the amount that Congress has always appropriated for the maintenance of roads, trails, and bridges in this park, and for the supervision of the park, until last year we appropriated for the current fiscal year $7,315. The four thousand additional was for new roads and trails.

Now, a detailed statement of that expenditure was submitted to the committee, and upon examination we found that $3,000 is an ample sum for the maintenance of the park, including the maintenance of all the roads, trails, and bridges that are in the park. The park is in the State of Oregon, and is one of the smallest of our national parks in area. It contains 159,360 acres and is almost in the center of a large forest reserve. In view, as I said in answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT], who offered an amendment in respect to the Yosemite Park—in view of the large amount asked for above the $3,000, a large part of it being for new and improved construction, the committee felt that we would not be warranted in recommending to the House an expenditure of this character at this particular time for the benefit of tourists. And I may say that while the number of tourists last year was greater than in any previous year, there is very little doubt of the fact that there will be a very much smaller number this coming year than there was last year.

The question was taken, and, on a division (demanded by Mr. HAWLEY), there were—ayes 15, noes 25.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 7, page 83, the following:

"Platt National Park, Oklahoma: For protection and improvement of Platt National Park, construction of fences, trails, roads, bridges, etc., to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000; of this amount, the sum of $15,000 shall be expended in the construction of a sanitary sewer through the park, with laterals to intersect with others connecting with the sewer system of the city of Sulphur, Okla.: Provided, That the municipality of Sulphur expend in the construction of said sewer system through the park the sum of $15,000."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I see from the report that this was in the original estimate and was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. A bridge on Rock Creek, in this national park, is one of the items included in this amendment. This bridge was placed there originally by the people of the city of Sulphur, and it was given to the Government when the Government segregated that portion of land for a national park. That bridge has become decayed and rotten, the Government has condemned it, and the people are deprived of its use. The creek is impassable at this point at times. The banks are so steep and high that only the lightest kind of vehicles can ascend and descend, so that it requires a drive of almost a mile to go from points which are only a short distance apart. It will require about $20,000 or $25,000 to build such a bridge as is needed.

Then there is another proposition. Platt National Park lies just south of Sulphur City, down the creek from Sulphur, and it is impossible to have any sewerage for the town unless a sewer can be run across Platt National Park. The authorities will not allow the sewage dumped in the park. So this provision for $15,000 to construct a sewer across the park is absolutely necessary at this time, in my opinion, because the town of Sulphur is getting to be a town of three or four thousand people, and possibly more. It is necessary for them to have some kind of sanitary sewer system. The park has been set aside as a national park, and I do not think there has ever been any appropriation for this park. I would like very much to see this amendment inserted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is right, that no appropriation has ever been made for this park, and the proposition is to appropriate more for it than for almost any of the parks in the United States. I read from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. The next is Platt National Park, Indian Territory.
Mr. GARFIELD. That is the Sulphur Springs Park.
The CHAIRMAN. That is a new proposition?
Mr. GARFIELD. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. We have never appropriated for it before?
Mr. GARFIELD. The fund was accumulated formerly for the care of the park. Now we have come to the point where it will have to be cared for by the Government.
The CHAIRMAN. What are the proceeds from the sale of the land in the last fiscal year?
Mr. GARFIELD. There was an available balance of $19,000. The expenditures have been $12,383, leaving an available balance of $19,000. There evidently were no sales of land last year, and I understand there will be no further revenues from the sale of property. Oh, yes; there will be one; if I can do something with the old hotel there, that I am trying to dispose of; but it is a very small amount, as I understand.
Balance available July 1, 1908, $31,851.30.

Leaving an available balance of $19,000, that they have the right to use on this park without further appropriation, and without enlightening the House as to what are the values of this park to the country, they are asking now, with a balance on hand of about $30,000, and with an estimated balance on the 1st day of next July of nearly $20,000, that this House appropriate $20,000 more for the improvement of this park.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to ask why the Secretary of the Interior asked for an appropriation, if he can use the money now available for that purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just as he asked for $240,000 for the Yosemite and got only $30,000, and just as he has asked for five or six times the amount of money that he has obtained for the improvement of other national parks, and with this new park of less interest almost than any of the rest, which has about $20,000 on hand, or will have next July, we are asked to give $20,000 more for its improvement.

Mr. CARTER. I would like to ask the gentleman why it is that this park is of so much less importance than others.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to have the gentleman tell me how it compares with the Yellowstone or the Yosemite.

Mr. CARTER. It is one of the greatest health resorts and has the greatest health-giving waters of any park in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That may be very true. There is a hotel there, but it is not a great park like the Yosemite that only got $30,000 by a vote of the House a few minutes ago, and they have $20,000, and now are asking us to appropriate for this park $40,000.

Mr. CARTER. The Yosemite is an old park. I would like to ask how much has been expended on it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Almost nothing by the National Government. The appropriations for the Yosemite have been $5,000 of $6,000 a year until within the last three or four years.

Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman consider $30,000 almost nothing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I said $5,000 or $6,000 until the last three or four years. It never received $30,000 until last year, and yet the gentleman is asking $40,000 for this park.

Mr. CARTER. We ask only $20,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But you have $30,000 available now, and it is estimated there will be on hand $20,000 in round numbers next July.

Mr. CARTER. In a few minutes my colleague, Mr. FERRIS, will read a report of the Secretary explaining that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have just read it.

Mr. CARTER. But he has a more recent one.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. All right.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman, I submit that this would be a very unreasonable request, but the conditions and facts and recent report of the Secretary do not coincide exactly with the view stated by the gentleman who is in charge of the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I read from the report in the hearings.

Mr. FERRIS. I have a letter in my hand from the Secretary of the Interior that I received this morning relative to this matter. The facts are these: The Secretary of the Interior came down into Oklahoma and segregated a large tract of land and made a national park out of it. The city of Sulphur, while quite a new city, and indeed a thriving and growing city, and quite a modern one as well, is situated in rough, broken country. Between two portions of the city is a great chasm. There is a bridge across it, which I would judge, not having the figures at hand, is in the neighborhood of a hundred or a hundred and fifty foot span.

Prior to the segregation this chasm between the two portions of the city was bridged by the citizens, who built the bridge at their own expense, independent of the Government. The Government took that into the national park. Then when they made the segregation the officials condemned the bridge, which places the citizens of Sulphur in an attitude that they neither can repair the bridge themselves nor get the Department to do it, so that they have to go around about 2 miles——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Can you identify that bridge for us?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I do not understand what the gentleman means by "identify." I have seen that bridge a number of times and passed over it a number of times.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I mean simply this, that this estimate that was furnished to the committee showed, "suspension bridge plans and supervision" and "for supervision repairs to Davis Avenue Bridge" and "construction of suspension bridge over Rock Creek at Bromide Springs." Is that the one?

Mr. FERRIS. That is the one.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is estimated to cost $950, and it was stated that there would be $19,000 on hand after building the bridge.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, the gentleman means some slight repairs that are only temporary. The Department, prior to this time, has condemned the bridge, and the citizens of Sulphur were not permitted to use it for a long time. I am advised it is unsafe now.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman say, when the Department says, "For suspension bridge, plans, and supervision, $50;" "for construction suspension bridge over Rock Creek and Bromide Springs," that that means slight repairs on a bridge?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I have had some recent conversation with the Secretary on that subject.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. He furnishes this testimony.

Mr. FERRIS. I am talking about the Davis Avenue Bridge.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is not that the bridge you mean?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. CARTER advises me that it is a different bridge. It is the Davis Avenue Bridge that I am referring to.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, the gentleman from Iowa misunderstands the proposition grossly. This is a different bridge entirely. The Davis Avenue Bridge is a bridge across this chasm which must have originally cost about $4,000 and was put up very cheaply at that. The bridge at Bromide is almost a mile below there.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is what I wanted the gentleman to identify.

Mr. CARTER. He possibly did not understand the question.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to state that a recent conversation I had with the Secretary was this: I went to see if the bridge could not be opened. One part of the city is absolutely cut off from the other part of the city when the Davis Avenue Bridge is out. The Secretary says that they have no funds with which to do it, but that he has recommended that $20,000 be given, and then they would have enough to fix that up. I again wrote to him a letter yesterday or the day before, and I have received his reply, and I would like to send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read in reference to this matter. There is some mistake here evidently, because the hearing does not coincide with the correspondence I have in my hand nor with the correspondence I had before on the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say that this was the official statement prepared in the Secretary's office. It was not a statement made by the Secretary on the spur of the moment, but an official statement prepared in his office.

Mr. FERRIS. If the park has $19,000 on hand, that would be an unusual request, but this letter does not so state, and neither does the conversation which I had with him even intimate such a thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to ask for five minutes more so that the letter can be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 30, 1908.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Your letter of the 25th instant received, inquiring what expenditures will be made in the Platt National Park this year, and also the amount appropriated by Congress for that reservation.

There will be expended for improvements in the Platt National Park during the balance of the present fiscal year approximately $3,000.

An estimate for an appropriation in the sum of $20,000 was submitted to Congress through the channel provided by law for that purpose (H. R. Doc. No. 12, 60th Cong., 1st sess., p. 431) for certain proposed improvements in the Platt National Park, namely:

Construction of stone culvert at Sulphur Run, near Pavilion Springs	$500
Construction of a brick barn for park horses and forage	2,000
Care and repair of buildings, fences, bridges, pavilions, and springs	2,500
For the construction of a sanitary sewer for Platt National Park with laterals to intersect with others connecting the sewer system of the city of Sulphur	15,000
Total	20,000

No appropriation for any of the purposes above set forth is contained in the sundry civil bill (H. R. 21260) reported to the House of Representatives on the 25th instant.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this proposition is a simple one. The people out there have built a town. Through the center of the town runs a chasm. The chasm belongs to the Government. After the town is established the Government creates a national park and takes in this chasm. Now, the testimony, that seems not to be controverted at all, shows that the bridge that was originally built across the chasm is unsafe and that the people can not cross it. The people can not build another bridge because they do not own the land. The land belongs to the Government. The Secretary of the Interior has investigated the question and says a new bridge ought to be built, and he says that it will take an appropriation of $20,000 to build a bridge.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. He does not say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what his letter says.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. His letter does not say anything about that at all; but the gentleman says that he has not the money to build a bridge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that the Secretary of the Interior would not come to Congress and ask for $20,000 from Congress if he had money in his hands to accomplish a public improvement that he says is necessary. Now, of course he may do it, but I do not think it is reasonable for us to put that interpretation upon his letter.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Has he asked for the money?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He has, in his estimate. There is the letter received asking for it. These people can not help this. The chasm separates the town, and that belongs to the Government. Nobody can build the bridge but the Government, and it seems to me if we are going to continue this national park, it is our clear duty to those people to make a sufficient appropriation to let them get along with, and I can not see any other conclusion to come to, if we take the statement of the Secretary of the Interior that this is necessary, and I judge from his letter and the appropriation that it must be.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Secretary has made no estimate of $20,000 for the construction of a bridge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All the information I have is what I have heard read.

Mr. TAWNEY. If he states in the letter that there is an estimate, I have a detailed statement here. He was before the committee. He made no such statement whatever. The estimates for this year were only $20,000, which included maintenance and everything else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman to let us ask unanimous consent to have the letter read in my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. You can have it read if you desire, but are you going to rely upon estimates submitted to Congress, as the law provides, or are you going to take a letter subsequently sent to Congress when the appropriation is under consideration and let it guide you as to how much should be appropriated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I believed in the Secretary of the Interior, as I do, and he has made a mistake in his estimate.

Mr. TAWNEY. He does not say that he has made any mistake.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be read.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Before that, I would ask on what authority is the statement made that there is already appropriated and available $19,000 for the purpose of this?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. On the statement of the Secretary of the Interior in the hearings on this bill.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Then, I think we ought to have the letter read again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the letter may be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be again read.

There was no objection.

The letter was again read.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is nothing in the letter, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, saying he estimated $20,000 for bridge or for sewers or——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The letter says he estimates $2,500.

Mr. TAWNEY. He gives the total for the proposed expenditures for the next fiscal year, aggregating $20,000, which is the amount of his estimate.

Now, he does not say anything at all about the surplus that they will have at the end of the fiscal year, which he estimates at $19,468, independent of the amount he will receive from the sale of the hotel.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it he would not ask for an appropriation of $20,000 if he had a surplus with which to do the work.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Why should he have that amount of money for the improvement of this park, which is insignificant as compared with other national parks, and especially so as compared with the Yosemite Park, for which we give but $30,000? Here, it appears, the revenues up to July 1, 1908, will amount to more than $30,000, and he estimates the expenditures up to the 1st of July as $12,873, and he says he will have a balance on hand of $19,468. And for this insignificant park, which is an unimportant park, which is a park unknown, it is claimed that you ought to spend far more money in the next year than we spend on any national park except Yellowstone.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it the condition is that this chasm belongs to the Government. The people living in the town before it was made a park built a bridge, and as it is they need a new bridge. They can not build it, because the Government owns the land.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Why, they want the Government to build a sanitary sewer for a bridge. That is what they want—a sanitary sewer for this town, to take the place of a bridge. That is what they are asking for. There is no pretense that they need a bridge that would cost $15,000.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask if they will only spend $3,000 for that? Is that what he states in the letter?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think if the gentleman will examine the letter he will find there is to be $3,000 expended during the remainder of the fiscal year ending July 1. The Secretary expressly says he would have for the coming fiscal year $19,000 available. Now, that is his testimony before the committee.

Mr. HARDY. Now, what I want to get at is to understand the position. I understand the Secretary says he has got $3,000 only this year to expend.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the Secretary does not so state in the letter. What he stated in the letter was that he proposed to expend $3,000 by the 1st of July.

Mr. HARDY. Let me state my proposition there; then the gentleman can go on. He then says that he asks an appropriation of $20,000. Now, if he has made that statement in his letter, I want to know why he asks twice for this $20,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will find in any number of instances estimates were made as to what can be expended; and then upon inquiry we find certain sums available. Then the Committee on Appropriations always reduces the amount asked for by the amount available. Now, the estimates are sent in by the people having charge of the park, and they are transmitted regularly by the Secretary to Congress. When he was questioned by the committee, he replied that he had $19,000 available for the coming year, and on his statement the committee did not see why any further sum should be appropriated.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me from his letter he did not seem to think he could use that money for bridge purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not so understand his letter. I want to say, not specially in connection with this matter, as I have no special interest in it, that I think that there is no more reprehensible practice than that which has recently grown up in the Departments sending a formal statement to the committee having charge of the matter and sending their representatives before those committees to make detailed statements, and then, when the matter comes up on the floor, to give to some Member of Congress information of a contrary condition. We had an instance here the other day of a gentleman from the Naval Affairs Committee talking about information that had been sent by Admiral Dewey contrary to an official statement over his own signature, and the fact subsequently developed that the report that he signed had been approved by the President, and yet he was having telephone communication with Members to a contrary purpose, and thereby affecting the judgment of the House against the formal and proper communication made by himself and other members of the Commission.

Mr. HARDY. That is all correct, and I would like the gentleman to give me his understanding as to this matter, and then we can get it cleared. I understand the gentleman to say that that estimate was submitted to this committee. It seems to me that there ought to be some rule if a Department has a right to expend a certain sum of money in a year and at the conclusion of the year have a sum of money on hand, that they have not expended, that that money ought to be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, the letter will clear up the whole situation. And before I read it I want to say that the fact that an estimate is made does not necessarily imply that the Department must have that much money. The estimate is to indicate what they think could be expended during the year; and then if it is discovered that they have an available balance that is sufficient for the estimated expenses, that covers it.

Mr. HARDY. I should like to ask if it suggested that the Secretary has a right to spend this money without any authority from Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand he has a right to expend this money and has been expending money from the same fund heretofore on this park. Let me read:

> Your letter of the 25th instant received inquiring what expenditures will be made in the Platt National Park this year, and also the amount appropriated by Congress for that reservation.
> There will be expended for improvements in the Platt National Park during the balance of the present fiscal year approximately $3,000.

"The balance of the present fiscal year" means between the date of this letter, April 30, 1908, and the 1st of July.

Now he goes on—

> An estimate for an appropriation in the sum of $20,000 was submitted to Congress through the channel provided by law for that purpose (H. R. Doc. No. 12, 60th Cong., 1st sess., p. 431), for certain proposed improvements in the Platt National Park, namely——

Mr. HARDY. Does not that letter imply that the Secretary thought it was necessary to have the authority of Congress to expend this money which he had on hand, or which he did not have on hand?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it implies that; but if it does imply that, the Secretary is mistaken. Now, to conclude the letter:

> No appropriation for any of the purposes above set forth is contained in the sundry civil bill (H. R. 21260) reported to the House of Representatives on the 25th instant.

That is a statement of the fact and nothing more. He does not say that there ought to be an appropriation of $20,000 carried. He does not recommend it at all.

Mr. HARDY. Your idea is that the Secretary has a perfect right to go on and build that bridge and make these improvements that he estimates for without any action on the part of Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. I take his own statement. He has $19,000 available for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HARDY. The proposition is that he can do these things without authority from Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably, and he has the money ample to do it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. It does not appear that that money can be expended after the 1st of July, 1908, unless Congress should appropriate, and I think there is the whole question. Undoubtedly, from this statement given here on page 469 of the hearings, the sum of $19,000 and some odd dollars is available for expenditure, and the Secretary estimates that up to July 1, 1908, he will have expended a certain amount, showing that up to that time he has a right or deems he has a right to expend money without further appropriation. It appears that this was a sum collected from the sale of property in this park prior to the time that the Government took it over. But I do not see that it necessarily follows from anything here that the Secretary would have the right to expend that sum, or any part of it, after the 1st of July, 1908, without a further authorization.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The existing law for the organization of the park authorizes that, without any further action.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Then that settles the whole question.

Mr. FERRIS. In connection with the letter that was addressed to me, I do not want to be unfair to the Secretary, nor do I want to appear in an unfair light to the committee. I want to say to this committee that if they have something over $19,000, it would look like an unusual request to come here and ask for more on that proposition; but I want to say to you that I have had numerous appeals from the local authorities to try and get that bridge opened, so that one part of the town could communicate with the other, and I went to the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Wilson, and made an appeal to him to rebuild and repair that bridge so that the people living in the two parts of the town could communicate with one another without going 2 or 3 miles around.

He said to me, not once, but two or three times, that he did not have money enough to rebuild and make repairs, but would submit an estimate of $20,000. I am not trying in my statement to the committee to overthrow that statement just read by the gentleman from Iowa, and I do not contend that my letter overthrows that statement, but I do say that they claim that they have not enough money to rebuild the bridge, in fact, no money at all for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to present one thought to him? In this estimate of $15,000 or $20,000 you ask for the construction of a sanitary sewer, with laterals, for the Platt National Park, and to intersect the others, amounting to $15,000. That is your bridge, is it not? That is what the $20,000 was estimated for, to build a sewer system?

Mr. FERRIS. The park has buildings of its own. They have a water service and they have other buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This is to carry off all the sewage of sulphur?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that the sewage of sulphur would all come through this sewer when it was built?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know the geography of the country, and does not he know that it would?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know but that it would.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Iowa is correct in his statement that a part of the money contemplated in this appropriation is to be used for completing a sewer. I want to say that the sewer is absolutely necessary for the health of the town; and if it was not for the fact of the topographical conditions mentioned by the gentleman, this money would not have to be expended by the citizens of Sulphur. This park lies, as the gentleman has said, just adjoining the city of Sulphur on the south. Rock Creek runs southward, and you can not drain the sewage without going through the entire park. Now, it seems to me, since the Federal authorities have placed the people of the town in this condition, cutting them off from any place to empty their sewage, that they ought to be willing to take care of the sewer through the park. Not only that, but I call attention to the proposition of which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has spoken, the creek dividing this town. The town originally was built upon the east side of the creek. Since then they have segregated the part where the business portion of the town originally was, and a part of the town is moved to the west side. It is impossible to pass from one part of the town to the other on account of this creek, which runs through a canyon with banks 20 or 30 feet high. Is it going to be the policy of the Government to segregate these lands and then leave the people without any means of communication? It will take about $20,000, I take it, at least $15,000, to build the bridge, and $15,000 or $20,000 to complete the sanitary sewer across the park. Being a new Member, I do not know what the policy of the Government has been in such cases as this, but it seems to me that it is the duty of the Federal Government to take care of that sewage and take it to a place where it can be dumped and at no expense to the people of Sulphur.

Mr. TAWNEY. How large a city is it?

Mr. CARTER. About 3,000 or 4,000, I think.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the topography of the land upon which the city is located?

Mr. CARTER. It is broken and undulating.

Mr. TAWNEY. Hilly and undulating?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. It needs a sewer system and needs it badly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARTER) there were—ayes 18, noes 44.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wind Cave National Park, South Dakota: For the management, improvement, and protection of the Wind Cave National Park, $2,500.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to a condition that prevails with respect to witnesses that have been brought here by the Government from the States of California and Oregon in the so-called "land-fraud cases." There are probably sixty or seventy of these witnesses. They are here to testify on behalf of the United States. Many of them are working people, depending upon their daily wage for their living. The Government pays their traveling expenses to and from the city of Washington on the railroads and gives them $1.25 a day as witness fees while they are here attending the sessions of the court. This amount is entirely inadequate. Many of them have been kept here two or three weeks.

Several of these witnesses have called upon me and have attracted my attention to this state of affairs. A number of witnesses will be out of pocket as the result of coming here to testify for the Government to the extent of upward of $100 or $150. It is a severe strain on the means of these poor people, and I sincerely hope that the Committee on Appropriations may see its way clear to present some item in the urgent deficiency bill, which will soon be brought in here, whereby these people may be properly remunerated for the loss of time and expense to which they have been put. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Testing machines, Watertown Arsenal: For the necessary professional and skilled labor, purchase of materials, tools, and appliances for operating the testing machines, for investigative test and tests of United States material for constructions, and for instruments and materials for operating the chemical laboratory in connection therewith, and for maintenance of the establishment, $35,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 89, after line 19, insert:
"And the testing machines at Watertown Arsenal are hereby transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under appropriations herein contained no contract shall be made for making or repairing concrete or asphalt pavements in Washington City at a higher price than $1.85 per square yard for a quality equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886, and with a base of not less than 6 inches in thickness.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph just read. It seems to me that it may be subject to a point of order, but I do not desire to make it unless after explanation I think it ought to be made.

In the first place, it seems rather strange that in determining the question of the quality of pavement we should go back twenty-two years for a standard of perfection or excellence. The Good Roads Division in the Agricultural Department in this city has been in operation for several years—some eight or ten years, I think—and it is engaged in instructing various sections of the country respecting the best method of street and highway improvement. Yet it has not been able, it seems from the provisions of this paragraph, to improve upon the character of the pavement which was laid in Washington more than twenty-two years ago.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit an interruption, I probably can save his time and the time of the committee. This paragraph has been carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill for a good many years, and is also carried in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and has been for many years. The standard here referred to is considered the best pavement that has ever been laid in the District of Columbia, and was laid at a less cost, and for the reason that, in the judgment of the engineers, this pavement referred to is the best pavement in the material and in the character of construction Congress has continued to use it as the standard as to cost and character of construction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. So that if the municipalities and the counties and the townships throughout the country are left to themselves they can work out successfully the problems of road building and street construction. I hope, for the sake of appearance, at least, and for the standing and reputation of the Good Roads Division in the Agricultural Department, we will not continue this antiquated, moss-covered provision any longer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean that the pavement of 1886 here is covered with moss.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; the provision in the bill, which is archaic on its face. We would improve the phraseology by saying "or as good a quality as any heretofore laid in the District of Columbia." That would go clear back to that ancient period when this standard of excellence obtained, many years ago. It does not look very well, it seems to me, in view of the wonderful improvement that has been made in the last twenty-five years, that we should go back a quarter of a century practically for a standard of excellence in road and street construction. That is away beyond the time when the Good Roads Division got into operation at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the Good Roads Division, since it got into operation, with all the appropriations that Congress has made for it, has never yet been able to build a piece of road or street that excels the one referred to in this paragraph.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, what is the use of the Good Roads Division? What are we paying that Division for?

Mr. TAWNEY. Unfortunately, the man who is really responsible for this provision and for the construction of the street is now dead. He was formerly a Member of this House. General Ketchum, of New York, is the man who originated this provision, and it was during his service on the Committee on Appropriations that this street was constructed, and it is confessedly the best street to-day in the city of Washington, the best pavement in the city of Washington. Pavements that have been laid since this pavement was laid have all been either repaired or entirely removed and new pavements laid in their place. I think that inasmuch as the gentleman has been a Member of this House a great many years, and inasmuch as this paragraph has by some hook or crook escaped his scrutinizing eye, that he should not and will not make the point of order; but in any event the point of order does not lie against it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me say I will close this discussion satisfactorily.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just a word, if the gentleman from Tennessee pleases. I assume now, from what the gentleman from Minnesota has said, that this provision is kept in as a tribute of respect to the distinguished gentleman from New York, the late General Ketcham. I concede that he is worthy of it, and that is the only reason for the provision; therefore I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee is this, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee, and I think we will have a better street after a while. I do not know much about asphaltum, nor do I know very much about pavements, but I do know how to make a good country road, because I have helped to make them. I know the difference between a good and a bad country road, and I know the difference between a good and a bad street. I think it is badly mixed in Washington, particularly here where it ought to be always good on Pennsylvania avenue; but my point is this, that there is a new kind of material used in making a better street than is made out of asphaltum. That is what I started in to state. This is called "bitulithic." I do not know what gave it the name—they seem to have been a little scarce of names when it was named—but, as a matter of fact, it has been used in my city, Nashville, and elsewhere, and I have seen it made, and it is made along the lines of the asphalt pavement, and is made very hard with some black fluid that is poured between broken rock, dust, and so forth, and it is then rolled.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But the gentleman understands they can not use that kind of street material under the provisions of this paragraph. We are tied up to the material used a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is exactly the thing I am joining the gentleman in protesting against, and I was about to suggest some kind of an amendment here. I had one a moment ago, but I have lost the page. I would ask to insert the words "bitulithic or asphalt," or some word giving the right to select any first-class material. Now, I want to tell you how our people get along with that bitulithic street.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman tell the committee something about the construction of a street with this material?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; but it seems like the chairman of the committee is determined not to hear what I have to say, as somebody is talking to him. I would like to have his ear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes or just a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that his time be extended for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will take only a minute or two more. You can insert here, if the chairman will permit it, "for making or repairing concrete with bitulithic or asphalt pavement." Now, the gentleman claims he wants the best, and I say to you honestly and frankly, from my observation of both kinds, that bitulithic is much better and I am told that it is cheaper. In fact, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], only a few weeks ago, when I was discussing this point, said it was much cheaper. Now, I do know that the surface is rough in dry and wet weather both, at least it is much rougher in dry weather than the asphalt pavement and it does not grow very slick in wet weather. I have never seen a horse or anybody slip up on this bitulithic pavement.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman does not refer to his own side of the House about not slipping up.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, they slip up sometimes on the Republicans.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision does not prevent the use of bitulithic pavement, if the gentleman will permit me. The object of this provision is to prevent a greater price than $1.85 a square yard being paid for the concrete or asphalt.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you say "asphalt?" I would say put in the words "bitulithic or asphalt, or other first-class material," so they may select from all kinds of material.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a limitation upon the price to be paid for either concrete or asphalt pavement; that is all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is not an asphalt pavement. It is called bitulithic and is bitulithic.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing here that requires that the street be paved either with concrete or asphalt.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you put asphalt in there if you do not mean asphalt?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Asphalt is meant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want us to say both asphalt and bitulithic.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will be patient a moment, he will see that this is to prevent an excessive price being paid either for asphalt or concrete whenever either is used. There is nothing here that requires that either one of these substances be used.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there anything in the law, I will ask anybody, that prohibits the Department or the parties in authority from buying the bitulithic material or the asphalt material or the concrete, if they so desire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nothing whatever that I have any knowledge of.

Mr. MANN. Nothing whatever, except in the various District appropriation bills, in which it is frequently provided that so much money is appropriated for the pavement of a certain street with asphalt.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be, but under that appropriation you could not use some other material, and this does not prevent the use of any particular material, but it does prevent an excessive price, or a price in excess of the amount stated here being paid per square yard when these particular materials are used.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is always correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Correct in this instance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad to know that we have no general or special law that prohibits the authorities from using any kind of the best material.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, if he will examine the District appropriation bill he will find in a part of it authority to pave or repave certain streets; the amount of money is specified, and in the items authorizing the paving or repaving of streets it is generally stated the material with which the street is to be paved.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is a matter of contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the District bill it might be possible that certain authorizations have been made that require certain material to be used, but that is because the District Commissioners in submitting their estimates ask that particular materials be used for paving purposes. This item is merely to prevent in the expenditure of the appropriation made a larger price per square yard for this particular kind of pavement than specified in here.

Mr. MACON. I suggest that all the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has to do is to go to work on the Commissioners and get them to use his particular kind of pavement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The main purpose of what I have said, I repeat, is to tell the committee and tell the Congress, and particularly the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who is inquiring, and the chairman, that I personally know that the bitulithic pavement in the city of Nashville has proved to be a longer-lived pavement and a better pavement than the asphalt. It rarely ever wears into holes, whereas, on the contrary, the asphalt is short lived and wears into holes, and is very unsatisfactory. The city of Nashville has repeatedly, I think, substituted the bitulithic for the other. I have no personal concern in the matter one way or the other. I just give the Congress the benefit of the information I have.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is aware of the fact that asphalt pavement never wears well except the street on which it is placed is used, while the bitulithic pavement wears a great deal better where there is no traffic on the street. I would not have supposed that would apply so strongly to the gentleman's city.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Our streets are narrow, and are very much used by every conceivable kind of vehicle that is known to transportation, from pleasure seeking to hauling heavy freight. They are used by the pedestrian, the equestrian, the dray, transfer lines, and automobiles. Bitulithic wears better than concrete or asphalt in Nashville. That is my observation and judgment.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems that all of this discussion came from the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], that we were still using old methods adopted and used way back in 1886. Now, I notice from the provisions of this bill that it provides that just such a pavement as was constructed in 1886 need not necessarily be constructed at this time, but that the cost of the construction of the pavement shall not exceed what was paid at that time. This bill provides that under the contract made for making or repairing concrete or asphalt pavements in the city of Washington the price shall not be higher than $1.85 per square yard for a quality equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886. It says that it must not be of a poorer quality than that laid at that time, but this bill does not provide that it shall not be of a better quality. Hence I take it that if a discovery has been made by which better pavements can be laid now than were laid in 1886, at the price specified in this bill, there is absolutely no reason whatever why we should not have better pavements than we had in 1886, if they can be laid for the price specified.

So the objection to this provision does not lie to the fact that we go back to 1886. It is not asked that the pavement laid now shall be just the same kind as was laid in 1886, but it does require the contractors to lay just as good pavement, and if a better pavement can be laid within the stipulated price, there is nothing in the provisions of this bill to prevent it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of the President of the United States, to be expended in his discretion and accounted for on his certificate solely, $25,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how much of this amount was expended last year by the President?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know.

Mr. MACON. Nor the year before?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nor the year before.

Mr. MACON. This is the third appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is the third appropriation. The appropriation was asked for the next fiscal year, and I assume it is needed.

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs of building where Abraham Lincoln died: For painting and miscellaneous repairs, $200.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in after the paragraph as a separate section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as new paragraph, page 99, after the word "dollars," line 7: "That the sum of $10,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated to aid the Ladies' Hermitage Association, of the State of Tennessee, a corporation which was in 1889 duly authorized to properly care for the Hermitage, the home of Gen. Andrew Jackson, and his tomb, and procure and preserve in the Hermitage the Andrew Jackson relics for the use and benefit of said association, which association and the State of Tennessee have spent more than $60,000, excluding interest, in purchasing and caring for the Hermitage and a portion of said relics. The said sum, when appropriated, shall be paid to the Ladies' Hermitage Association and by it used in procuring the balance of said relics, and for no other purpose."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is one very dear to the heart of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I will give him a chance to make a speech.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am forced to believe from the words just uttered by the gentleman that it is a matter near his heart.

Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that ordinarily I would not offer an amendment, subject, as this is, to a point of order because new legislation, but this is not the ordinary or undigested amendment, but one well known to us all.

The proposition has been thoroughly discussed, both here and in the Senate. It has been thoroughly discussed before the Senate committee, and the Senate committee reported a bill for $25,000 to aid in caring for the Hermitage. The House committee has considered a similar bill thoroughly, and has reported a bill for $30,000 to do the same thing and also buy these relics, and they are both now pending in the House—a Senate bill and a House bill. I do not ask, Mr. Chairman, for $25,000 to take care of the Hermitage, houses, and so forth and so on, now, but I do ask, as seriously as any request I could possibly make to this or any other Congress, that you give to the Ladies' Hermitage Association $10,000 now to buy these relics, now, I may say, in the hands of Mrs. Andrew Jackson, jr., living in Knoxville, for which formerly $17,500 was asked. But the good women of this association have bought about $7,500 of them, and recently Mrs. Jackson has written to me and, in effect, said:

Mr. GAINES, I will take $10,000 for the balance.

Now, another fact. She is a poor woman. She has three splendid young sons, one of whom, I believe, the President has tendered an alternateship to Annapolis. That good woman is selling by degrees, now and then, the remainder of these relics to get money to send her boys to school. It would be a great godsend not only to her, a widow, with these three responsibilities, one of whom I say the President is trying to help along, to buy these relics, but it would be a proper thing to buy these relics for this association. Every man should be glad to have them preserved and kept from being scattered around over the country, because I hear of them from all points of the compass in the United States. Anyone who wants these relics—and she is selling them one or two at a time, to get money to send her boys to school and care for herself. She simply sells them for what she can get, and she is struggling to hold them for Congress to buy for this association, which she thinks should have them.

Now, gentlemen, I am not here to comment on Andrew Jackson or any other man. You all know what he did, both in war and in peace; and I might say that nothing that I can say, or anybody else can say, could make him any greater than he is, because he is as great as human flesh ever got to be on American soil.

The great State of Tennessee, in which his ashes are laid, bought the Hermitage before the civil war, for which she paid $48,000 and issued bonds for it.

Here is the statute authorizing the purchase. Bonds were issued at that time to pay for it. The war came on, and the bonds were not paid until the interest and principal amounted to nearly $160,000. That is the amount which the Hermitage cost the old Volunteer State, where this great general and great hero and patriot lived and where his ashes rest. In addition to this the good women, the Ladies' Hermitage Association, who have immediate control of the buildings, the tomb, and 25 acres of ground surrounding them, have, in their own sweet, beautiful, and patriotic way, collected about $27,700, and spent that in preserving the houses, that were going into decay when they took charge of them. This is a regularly chartered organization. They have collected a great many of the relics.

They have repainted the house; they have propped up and reroofed the log cabin where the old hero lived when he went to fight the battle of New Orleans and when he fought our Indian wars and when he was elected President of the United States. They are carrying everything back as near as possible to the exact status it was in when his glorious old spirit took its everlasting flight. That is the way we want to keep everything; but we can not get it back to that high standard of preservation without the money to buy these relics that Jackson had there, but which are now being scattered all over the world.

Here is a State whose people have expended $160,000 plus $27,000. What other State has done as much for one of her heroes as my State has done in this matter?

I am proud of what she has done. Was General Jackson a State character only? No; he was a national character; indeed an international character. Why, when I went over to the Philippine Islands I met a man in the island of Ceylon as black as the ace of spades, and when he found out that I was an officer of the United States Government he said:

> Your greatest man was George Washington. He was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen. Thomas Jefferson wrote your Declaration of Independence.

And quoted several passages from it—

> He was your greatest writer. General Jackson was one of your great men. He was one of the greatest generals in his time. General Grant and Gen. Robert E. Lee were your greatest generals in recent years.

So you can see that our ideals are well known in all the world, and amongst them is Andrew Jackson. Yet Congress has never aided the State of Tennessee to preserve the Hermitage, which Jackson built and in which he died. Not a cent has the United States ever given. General Jackson spilled his blood for his country. From the time he was 13 years old he was in public life. The grave of his mother, a heroine of the Revolutionary war, is unknown and was to him. His two brothers were victims of that war, and their graves are unknown and were to him, and the place of his father's grave is unknown and was to him; but whether Jackson's grave is left unkept by State and nation, he will live, regardless of what we do, because he was always a patriot and always stood up for the Constitution of the United States and the flag. I say as little as we can do as an American Congress, representing the American people and the American heart, would be to say, "Here, Tennessee, here, Ladies' Hermitage Association, is the tribute of the Federal Government and its offering to your great work at the Hermitage. Congress for the people has been long in giving you this, but we are glad to do it now." [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt that the amendment is subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Old railroad station: For a watchman for the old railroad station building at the southwest corner of Sixth and B streets NW., $720.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have been asked by a number of people what is to be done with this old railroad station; and if the committee have any information on the subject, I should like to have them state it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This station is now the property of the United States, like any other property belonging to the Government. It is subject to such use as it may be put to by the authority of Congress. Personally I believe it is very much superior to many of the private residences and the like now used for divisions and Bureaus of the Government, and that within a short time a division or bureau of the Government ought to be housed in the building. If such a bureau or division can be found, it ought to be placed in the building. In the meantime it is being used for storage purposes, but much of it is altogether too good in quality to be permanently used for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving New York Harbor, New York: For continuing improvement of Ambrose Channel (formerly known as "East Channel") across Sandy Hook bar, $318,490.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask why this amount was appropriated instead of $486,490, estimated by the engineers?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The engineers made that estimate originally, but they were requested to make a new estimate and give the amount that they would be able to use before next March, and they gave the amount that they could use in the meantime, and this amount was put in in accordance with the later estimate.

Mr. PARSONS. And next year the balance will have to be appropriated in a deficiency bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; it will be carried in the sundry civil bill. Every dollar is appropriated in these river and harbor items that the engineers reported could be used before the next sundry civil bill is passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving waterway from Franklin to Mermentau, La.: For continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 100, after line 10, insert:
> "Improving the Great Peedee River, South Carolina: For continuing the upper portion of river improvement, $11,300.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is within the authorized limit of cost, and the Chief of Engineers has reported since the bill was made up that this amount will be needed before the next sundry civil bill is passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving Sabine Pass, Tex.: For continuing improvement, $190,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 107, after line 13, add: "Improving the St. Michael Canal, Alaska, for completing improvement, $150,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does this amendment affect Sabine Pass, Tex., in any way? I see it is an amendment to come in after line 13.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; this is like the other amendments I have offered, reported by the engineers since making up the bill. It does not affect Sabine Pass at all; it is a separate item.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving harbor at San Juan, P. R.: For continuing improvement, $220,000.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the basis of the $220,000 that has been fixed upon?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This is that portion of the amount now authorized by law deemed necessary by the engineers which will be needed before the passage of the next sundry civil bill.

Mr. LARRINAGA. The reason of my inquiry is that the work has been proceeding there for three or four months, and all the difficulties that are generally encountered in the beginning of a work have been overcome. The work to be done the next year is easy, and as the work is paid for by the quantity every month, I anticipate that the expenditure is going to be pretty large. You can work in all the harbors of San Juan and practically in all Porto Rico every day in the year. I, myself, have been a chief engineer in charge of harbor work in San Juan, and have conducted that work for some time, and I anticipate that a larger amount will be necessary. Will the gentleman from Iowa inform me as to how these figures have been made up?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It was originally estimated by the Chief of Engineers that $300,000 could be used during the next year, but subsequently he reported the amount carried in the bill would be all that could be utilized before the next sundry civil bill passed.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Did he give any reason why it should be reduced?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The original estimates were made by the Chief of Engineers to cover the entire fiscal year, which would be a year from next July, but he subsequently reduced his estimates to what would be consumed before the passage of the next sundry civil bill, which would be not later than the 4th of March next year. He has been allowed what he could utilize in that time.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Well, he could judge of that all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance of South Pass channel, Mississippi River: For continuing improvement and maintenance, $50,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 108, after line 2, insert:

"Improving harbors on the coast of Mississippi: For completing construction of dredge for use in said harbors and the channels adjacent thereto, $125,000."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, that item is like the others, is authorized by existing law, but it is not included in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Pamlico Sound to Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina: For continuing improvement, $170,000.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the hearings that an estimate of $350,000 is made by the Chief of Engineers for the work of improving the waterway from Pamlico Sound to Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina. Why is it that the amount was reduced to $170,000 by the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Because, as already stated, with reference to some other items, the Chief of Engineers has reported this reduced amount is all that is necessary to be used before the 4th day of next March.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Then there was a revised estimate?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There was no revised estimate, but a reduction based upon the time that he would spend on it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. According to that reduction this amount, $170,000, would enable the Engineer Corps to carry on the work up to March 1, 1909?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. And then I suppose the next sundry civil appropriation bill will carry the balance of the money needed?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It will carry whatever is necessary for the balance.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River: For continuing improvement of Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries and clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission, $2,000,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 108, lines 22 and 23, after the word "the," in line 22, strike out the words "mouth of the Ohio River" and insert "the highlands, at or near Cape Girardeau, Mo.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment, that it changes existing law. I will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken about this not being authorized by existing law. The Fifty-ninth Congress passed a law specifically extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission up to the highlands at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and when the rivers and harbors appropriation bill that followed was in this House, Mr. BURTON, the chairman of the committee, accepted an amendment extending the provision up to the highlands at Cape Girardeau. The law is very clear on the subject, and I do not think the gentleman will insist that it is not, after the statement made upon that question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to state positively of course that the law has not been changed as indicated by the gentleman, but I have no further information, and I submit that I ought to insist on the point of order until the gentleman cites the identical law.

Mr. MACON. I can get it in a few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What is the object of making this change, if the gentleman is correct?

Mr. MACON. Why, to extend this appropriation to projects up the river above the mouth of the Ohio. That is why—projects that are in course of progress.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It goes up to the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. MACON. Yes; but it goes up farther on the other side. I will get the law if the gentleman will allow me. If the gentleman will allow me to return to this by unanimous consent, I will show the gentleman the law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I should have to insist on the point of order at this time, because this is the language used by the Chief of Engineers, who ought to be advised if there is such a change as the gentleman thinks.

Mr. MACON. Certainly the gentleman will not insist that this is in conflict with existing law when I tell him emphatically that Congress in the last session, I believe it was the last session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, if not the first, passed a specific law authorizing the construction of levees up to the highlands at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and extended the jurisdiction of the Commission to that point?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to state I believe the gentleman is entirely sincere in the belief he has stated the law, but he has not the law to present, but simply says it was passed, and I must insist——

Mr. MACON. I said it was passed in the first or second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and if the chairman of the committee [Mr. PRINCE] were present, he would bear me out in the statement.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This is a river and harbor item.

Mr. MACON. That was a river and harbor bill that was passed then.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the chairman of the committee or the gentleman think it is fair to insist upon the point of order based upon a statement that he himself does not know what the law is?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I certainly do; I certainly do. When gentlemen are contending that a law has been modified, they ought to produce the law.

Mr. ADAIR. They are willing to produce the law if they have the time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have no doubt they think they are stating it correctly.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman has made the point of order and says that there is no law authorizing the appropriation for that purpose, and the burden is upon him to show it. I insist that the law does exist and have only asked him to allow this to go over by unanimous consent until I can have the law brought from the library. I know that it passed. I introduced the bill, sir, and certainly we do not forget when measures of that kind which we have introduced become a law. They are too important to us. This particular proposition is too important to my section of the country for the gentleman to tell me that I do not know that it is a part of the law of the land at this hour.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As far as I am able to discover, if the gentleman is correct, his amendment is unnecessary; but if he is incorrect, his amendment is out of order. Now, I have no doubt on earth that the gentleman thinks he has stated this law correctly, but he has not the law before him, and he does not remember what session of Congress it passed, and I would like to see it.

Mr. MACON. The chairman of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River will bear me out in the statement that the law was passed in the first or second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have the law, and I will read it:

Improving Mississippi River, from Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, official, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement, $3,000,000, which shall be expended under direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees between the Head of the Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo.

Mr. PRINCE. What is the question?

Mr. MACON. I will state to the chairman of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River that I have offered an amendment here to this provision in the bill which provides for the improvement of the Mississippi River, which reads:

Improving Mississippi River: For continuing improvement of Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries and clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission, $2,000,000.

I have offered as an amendment to strike out "the mouth of the Ohio River" and to insert "highlands at or near Cape Girardeau, Mo." The gentleman in charge of the bill insists that there is no authorization for that appropriation and that the amendment is in conflict with existing law.

Mr. PRINCE. Was not the law passed at the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress——

Mr. MACON. Authorizing an appropriation.

Mr. PRINCE. And extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission northward about 50 miles to Cape Girardeau, as I recollect it. There is no question about that. That is the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman say that this work described in his amendment has already been contracted for?

Mr. MACON. I did not hear the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas contend that the work covered by his amendment has been contracted for?

Mr. MACON. I understand so, sir. While in Memphis, about six weeks or two months ago, I was told that the Commission had made a contract and that the contractor had begun the construction of the levee that my bill provided for. The engineer told me that himself. I do not know anything further about it. But if there is nothing, Mr. Chairman, if no contract has been let for the construction of the work, if it is not in progress, then my amendment will not affect the matter one bit, because it will not be a piece of work in progress or in the course of construction. If they have provided for it, if there is a contract for it, then my amendmet will cover the case. Otherwise it will not. Now, if the Chair will read this——

The CHAIRMAN. What does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations say with respect to the contract for the construction of this work referred to in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have no information on that subject. This estimate was sent down in the exact form in which it appears in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair will notice, this item is for the purpose of continuing an improvement authorized under the act of 1902.

Mr. MACON. Nineteen hundred and two? That being the case, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is correct about that, then, of course, a point of order would lie against my amendment, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to withdraw it so far as that case is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be that I am mistaken.

Mr. MACON. I do not want to do anything that is contrary to law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, I would like to call the Chair's attention to the fact that this law under which he claims that this is authorized, while somewhat awkwardly drawn, because, no doubt, of its amendment on the floor, is as follows:

Improving the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, official, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement, $3,000,000.

Now, we have, first, here an appropriation of $3,000,000 for that purpose, and then we will find that that appropriation is also made available for certain other purposes, namely:

Which shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers for the general improvement of the river.

Now, that, I presume, was the end of this section as it came into the House. To that was added:

For the building of levees between the Head of the Passes.

And so forth, thus making the $3,000,000 available not only for the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers, but also making that appropriation available for the improvement above the mouth of the Ohio River. But then the authorization to contract comes in, namely:

That on and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War may enter into additional contracts for such material and work as may be necessary to carry on continuously the plans of the Mississippi River Commission as aforesaid.

This act, taken as a whole, provides for a $3,000,000 appropriation to execute the plans already approved, or thereafter to be approved, of the Mississippi River Commission, and in addition thereto for the improvement of the river above the mouth of the Ohio. But when the authorization comes it is in the language originally devised by the committee and does not extend beyond the plans of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers of the Army. So that while the then current appropriation was made available for this improvement above the mouth of the Ohio, the authorization for further contracts does not, in my judgment, apply above the mouth of the Ohio. At any rate, there is no evidence of any contract being made.

Now, the Chief of Engineers, familiar with all these laws, sends down this estimate in this language. It is adopted by the committee. I do not think it can properly be changed. If the gentleman's theory is correct—that the authorization to expend the $3,000,000, when appropriated, above the mouth of the Ohio River, also authorizes the expenditure of $3,000,000 more under contract above the mouth of the Ohio—then, in my judgment, the language in the bill is sufficient to make the money available for that purpose. It is an appropriation under this section. But to allow him to make his amendment is to solve what should be the true construction of the original act and extend the use of this money to a place where, in my judgment, he did not succeed in extending it by his amendment injected upon the floor.

Now, the gentleman was somewhat indignant that I wanted to see the statute; yet when the statute is produced I find that, to my mind, it is exceedingly blind and indefinite.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read him the statute.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have the statute, and have been reading from it.

Mr. MACON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. You have the river and harbor act. Read the law. I will let you read it.

It simply corroborates the statement I have just made to the Chair, and I will read it:

Out of any funds which have been or may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for improving Mississippi River, from Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, * * * which shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees between the Head of the Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo.

What was that which was approved? In other words, it is set out in the very language in which this bill shall carry this money. Any part of it set apart for levees the Commission may see fit to use; and the gentleman is simply seeking by his amendment to make the full amount of money and not the money set apart for levees available for it. Now, the language put in the bill is to make the money available above the mouth of the Ohio for as much as may be set apart for levees, and that is all that is intended.

Mr. MACON. The part of the law that authorizes the expenditure of any money whatever for the improvement of the Mississippi River by way of construction of levees is to be found in the act that created the Mississippi River Commission. In other words, the act provides that money is to be appropriated to aid in the construction of levees, and the Commission is given authority to apportion it to the different projects along the Mississippi River. Up to the time the law was passed that the gentleman from Iowa last read, the Commission had no authority whatever under existing law to expend any part of the money appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River at a higher point than the mouth of the Ohio River.

The Commission saw the great necessity of improving the river farther up, on the other side, by extending the levee system 50 miles, to the highlands at or near Cape Girardeau, Mo. It therefore suggested that the original law ought to be amended to the extent that it be given authority to construct levees up to Cape Girardeau, Mo. The chairman of the Commission himself, General Ernst, was so much interested in the matter that he came to Washington from the city of St. Louis and appeared before the committee in behalf of the measure, and insisted that it was highly necessary that the bill pass; and it was passed by a unanimous vote of this House during the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Now, sir, I insist that all moneys that are to be hereafter appropriated for the purpose of improving the Mississippi River in the matter of construction of levees are henceforth to be expended, under the law as it now exists, as high up as Cape Girardeau, Mo., instead of stopping at the mouth of the Ohio River, under the original law, because the original act has been amended and authority has been extended up to Cape Girardeau. Hence, sir, the Commission ought to be given specific authority in this bill to use the money appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River on any project on said river between the Head of the Passes and Cape Girardeau, instead of to the mouth of the Ohio. Hence I insist that the point of order ought not to lie against this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This law that you have got provides that any portion of the money allotted for levees in the appropriations shall be used?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, if you change that, the language is for continuing improvement of the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to Cape Girardeau?

Mr. MACON. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This makes it available not only for levees but the very specific thing that you want to change. That is a change that you make.

Mr. MACON. The original law makes it available.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This makes it only available for levees; the law you cited made it available for other purposes as well.

Mr. MACON. It makes it available for levees, and the Commission has the right to improve it otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Out of the appropriations for the river below?

Mr. MACON. From the mouth of the Ohio to the highlands.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Below that?

Mr. MACON. I do not know about below that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That act makes the appropriation for improvements of the river below, and you are taking this and expending it not only on the levees, but on other improvements.

Mr. MACON. But does not the gentleman expect that money to be expended for the general improvement of the Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Under the authorization of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MACON. To do what?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For the improvement of navigation, not wholly for levees.

Mr. MACON. For the improvement of navigation? Do you not know it is for the improvement of the levees?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not wholly so.

Mr. MACON. For what other purpose can it be used?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I understand it can be used for other purposes.

Mr. MACON. For what purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The improvement of navigation.

Mr. MACON. Do you know of many improvements on the Mississippi River below the mouth of the Ohio that have been made in any other way except by the construction of levees?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes; I think so.

Mr. MACON. I know of very few, and I live upon the river.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I insist it is perfectly plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It must be borne in mind that this is not a river and harbor bill, but a bill making appropriations for improvements that have been authorized by law and placed under contract. Now, in view of the statement made by the chairman of the committee that the language of the paragraph in the bill making the appropriation is the language furnished by the Chief of Engineers, and in the absence of any evidence of a contract that would cover the improvement between the points named in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, it seems to the Chair that the point of order ought to be sustained. But, in addition to that, the provision in the bill is for the general improvement of the Mississippi River between the points named, while the legislation to which the gentleman from Arkansas calls the attention of the Chair is for the expenditure of money allotted to levees, not to general improvements of the river between the points named. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 15725. An act to relinquish, release, and confirm the title of certain lands in California to the Western Power Company;

H. R. 19463. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 16515. An act authorizing the purchase of a steel ferryboat for use between Angel Island and San Francisco, Cal., and a steel cutter for use of immigration officials at San Francisco, Cal.; and

H. J. Res. 155. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at the national convention of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks to be held at Dallas, Tex., in July, 1908.

THE CYCLONE OF APRIL 24, 1908.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution 173, for the relief of the sufferers from the cyclone which occurred in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana on April 24, 1908, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOWERS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 173) for the relief of the sufferers from the cyclone which occurred in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana on April 24, 1908, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, of the joint resolution just reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be considered as engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it ought at least to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution, with the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to procure, in open market or otherwise, subsistence and quartermaster supplies, medicines, and medical aid, in addition to such supplies belonging to the military establishment and available, and issue same to such destitute persons as have been rendered homeless or are in needy circumstances as the result of the cyclone which occurred April 24, 1908, in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and in executing this joint resolution is directed to cooperate with the authorities of the said States.

SEC. 2. That to enable the Secretary of War to execute the provisions of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be expended under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "resolution," insert "and of the joint resolution on the same subject adopted April 27, 1907."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AMENDING THE PASSENGER ACT OF 1882.

Mr. BURNETT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURNETT. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have until Monday afternoon next to file minority views on the bill (S. 5083) to amend section 1 of the passenger act of 1882.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the bill mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF MEMBERSHIP IN THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17516) to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission by one member.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of Commissioners constituting the Philippine Commission is hereby increased by one additional member, making the Commission consist of nine members. Said additional member shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive the same salary and emoluments as is now, or may hereafter be, prescribed by law.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

Add another section to the bill, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized in his discretion to create by Executive order and name a new executive department in the Philippine government, and to embrace therein such existing bureaus as he may designate in the order; and in his appointment of any Commission member he shall specify in his message to the Senate the department, if any, of which the appointee shall be the secretary."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission by one member, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill just read, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has twenty minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has twenty minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the bill authorizes the addition of one member to the Philippine Commission. The Commission is now composed of eight members, four of whom are executive officers, members, in one sense, of the cabinet of the governor of the islands. There are four administrative or executive departments of the Philippine government. The Philippine Commission constitutes the upper body of the Philippine legislature, and the four executive members of the Commission and four others who perform simply legislative functions, of course, have to consent to all bills that are passed by the Philippine legislature. Section 2 of this bill authorizes the President to create one additional executive department. It is the desire of the Commission to separate the departments of finance and justice, I understand, into two distinct departments. Those two are now combined in one. It is desired that the new member of the Commission shall also be an executive officer at the head of one of the departments.

The Commission very earnestly recommend this bill, and the Commission deem it highly important that the additional member of the Commission be provided for, not only for the reason I have already suggested, but to enable the Commission more easily to secure a quorum. It now requires five members to constitute a quorum, and the administrative and executive duties of the members of the Commission require them to be away from the capital at certain periods as long as a month or six weeks at a time, and if one member is added to the number it will be much easier to have a quorum at the meetings of the Commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many Commissioners are there now?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Eight.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How long have they had eight members?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Since the organic act was passed, in 1902, I believe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much salary do they get?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The executive Commissioners get $15,500 a year, and the legislative Commissioners get, I believe, $7,500 a year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This one that you propose to add will get how much?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Seven thousand five hundred dollars a year until the President creates another executive department and he should be appointed at the head of that department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What executive department do they want to create?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The branches of finance and justice are now combined under one department, and it is desired to separate those two, because there is no logical relation between them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they have got along as well as you say they have up to this time, what do they want to change it now for?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They require legislation there the same as we do in this country. We have got along admirably for one hundred and twenty-five years, and yet we hardly have the time to pass what new legislation we consider necessary. It seems that the better a country gets along the more legislation it requires.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the duty of the other Commissioners besides the one that has charge of the department of justice and finance?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is the department of education, the department of the interior, and the departments have the executive and administrative work of the islands distributed among them—not, perhaps, as systematicly as we have.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman that it does not seem logical to have the departments of justice and finance together, but it seems to me that they could rearrange these departments without creating a new office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They could not without legislative action, because the departments are provided for in the organic act of 1902.

Mr. SHERLEY. Who pays for this office?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The salaries of the Commission are paid by the Philippine government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Have the Filipinos made a request for this additional Commissioner?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know about the Filipinos personally, but——

Mr. SHERLEY. They are going to foot the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Speaking in a sense confidentially, I understand the additional Commissioner is to be a Filipino.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason I asked the question was because one of the general complaints that I heard while in the Philippines was that the government we were putting upon these people was too expensive and too elaborate for their needs. Now, to create a new office unless the Filipinos want it——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will say to the gentleman that the representatives of the Philippine government in the city of Washington are for this bill. They attended the meetings of the committee when it was under consideration, and both of them favored the enactment of the bill. The Commission is earnestly in favor of it. The Secretary of War, who recently visited the archipelago and investigated the whole situation, and who was before, perhaps, more familiar with the conditions there than any other man in America, regards it as of considerable importance. I believe we ought to defer largely to the judgment of men who are charged with the responsibility of administering affairs in those islands, respecting legislation that may be necessary.

Mr. DALZELL. What committee does this bill come from?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. DALZELL. Is there a unanimous report?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A unanimous report. There was no opposition to the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. In a general way I agree with the gentleman, and I should go slow in differing with the Secretary of War. But there has been a tendency to multiply offices, and I should like some special reason given why we should create such a high-salaried office there now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I appreciate the criticism the gentleman makes. It impressed me, too, that the government there, viewed from our standards, might be a little top-heavy, a little too expensive, but I think we ought to defer, as I said a moment ago, to the judgment and recommendation of the men who are on the ground and know conditions. We can not determine the demands of the Philippine Archipelago by American standards. What may be required here might not do at all there.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just the point. We are very largely governing them from American standards, and are imposing upon them a government very much more elaborate, in my judgment, than the wealth of the country or the needs of the people make requisite. This is in direct line of elaboration of government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; this is not in line of elaboration; it is in line of systemizing the government down there.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is another way of phrasing it. It is in line of creating a new office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And reducing administration to a business basis. That is the real situation. A couple of years ago the Commission eliminated a number of bureaus and saved about a million dollars a year of expense, and I think others ought to be eliminated and probably will be in the course of a year or two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Were the four departments that now exist created by act of Congress or by Executive order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By act of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not by act of Congress do the same in this instance—segregate the various bureaus into departments, that it is believed proper to have, rather than to delegate so much power to the President?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, the judgment of the Commission and of the Secretary of War is that that discretion would best be left with the President; and when the Commission gets ready for the additional department, it will inform the President, and the probabilities are that he will create it. They are willing to trust that question to the discretion of the President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no doubt that when the President appoints, they are perfectly willing to trust to the President the power to divide up these offices as they wish, but since the gentleman's committee believes in the first instance that Congress should determine the departments and how they should be constituted, does he not think the Congress should be convinced first that it should be done, and that Congress ought to exercise its judgment as to the manner in which the departments should be divided?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It might, if Congress was in a position to know. In conversation with the Secretary of War only a few days ago, he said they had not finally decided that a new department should be created, but he thought it ought to be; but the question of considering the various administrative bureaus and divisions is one that will take some time, and one that perhaps Congress would hardly be competent to decide.

Mr. SHERLEY. If Congress was competent originally to separate that government into four departments, is it incompetent now to determine whether there should be four or five?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Congress never did that originally. The Philippine Commission created the four departments and Congress enacted the work of the Commission into law. That was all that was done in the first place. I now reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the gentleman, and then I will ask him the question; in the first place, this bill, as I understand it, leaves it to the President to establish, if he sees fit, a new department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman tells us that it is expected to separate the department of justice from the department of finance, and have it designated as this new department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; but the administration of justice and the administration of finance are in one department.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I want to reach if the gentleman will permit. When the President designates the new department, he will call the department by something that is not now named——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No.

Mr. NORRIS. He could not call it the department of finance, nor could he well call it the department of justice.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why?

Mr. NORRIS. Because we already have a department of justice and a department of finance.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They have a department of finance and justice as one department. If a new one is created, one will be the department of finance and one will be the department of justice.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the bill ought to be amended, it seems to me, to give the President authority to change the name of the present department. Under the bill, as I understand it, he would not have any right to change the name of that department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, indeed, it gives him the power to create a new department, and of course he would have to designate it.

Mr. NORRIS. But he would not desire to give it the name of some department that already exists, and if he can not change the name he would have to give it the name of a department that already exists.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That part the committee did not consider. The bill was prepared in the office of the Secretary of War and earnestly recommended by the Secretary himself, and we acted upon his judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the gentleman think there should be some amendment of that kind?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I do not. I do not think there is any danger of that; otherwise it would have been considered and provided for in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me to be apparent on the face of it that if there is one department there now called the "department of finance and justice" you could not have another department named a "department of finance" and another department named the "department of justice."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be very conflicting.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to further interrogate the gentleman from Indiana. I notice in your report a statement that the government of the Philippines now comprises four departments, the department of finance and justice, the department of the interior, the department of commerce and police, and the department of education. Now, you have eight commissioners; what do the other four do?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This Commission, the gentleman will bear in mind, has legislative as well as administrative functions, and four of its members are heads of departments and four of them simply perform legislative functions.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you mean that only four have anything to do with the making of laws for the archipelago? The entire eight are constituted a Commission to assist in the enacting of laws; but, as I understand the gentleman, four of them, in addition to their legislative duties, are heads of departments and have executive duties to perform. If four of them can attend to legislative duties and executive duties, why could not you, instead of increasing the number, simply give the four who only have legislative duties some departmental duties and let them attend to it that way?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I must confess I was not listening to the gentleman's question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I say inasmuch as by your statement four of them give their time only to legislative duties and the other four give their time to both legislative and departmental duties, why not let the four who are only doing legislative duties take some of the burden of the departmental duties instead of increasing the number?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Commission desires an increase in the number, as I said a moment ago.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand they desire it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In order that it may increase the facilities for having a quorum, because the administrative officers are away from the capital substantial portions of every year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that Congress would be justified in adding to the number of this Commission on the statement that it would facilitate the having of a quorum with which to do business?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do, upon the statement of the men that we have sent down there to administer that important trust, men who are on the ground, men who know about conditions, men who carry the responsibilities. When they come to us and ask for legislation, if we refuse to grant it we take the responsibility, then, and relieve them from it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Relieve them from the responsibility of success of administration in the archipelago.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably we do; but when we simply take their statement, without finding some reason for it, we are delegating our functions as legislators to them. Now, I understand what they ask, but I think the chairman of this committee or the members of this committee should give to the House some of the reasons that these people advance. Now, one of the reasons that I understand has been advanced is the fact that it will make the obtaining of a quorum easy. That may be a reason, but it is hardly a sufficient reason for adding to the number of the Commissioners. And another statement is that this is recommended by the Filipinos, and that statement would have more weight if it was not for the fact that one of the motives that might actuate them is clearly shown by the gentleman's statement that it is proposed to appoint a Filipino, though nothing is said in the law that requires that appointment to go to a Filipino. Of course it is true that they are anxious to get as large a proportion of representation as is possible, but I submit to the gentleman that the House is asked to take a good deal on faith when we have a report here that simply says there are four departments now, and four Commissioners attend to them, and the other four attend to legislative matters only, and in order to get a quorum they should have an additional member. I do not believe the House can afford, on the statement contained in this report, to create an office of that size.

Now, the danger of the English race in legislation as to their colonies is that there has always been a tendency to overlegislate and to make the standard of their civilization the standard for the colony without regard to the local conditions there; and we can very easily burden that country, which is a poor country, with a machinery of government away beyond its means and beyond its power properly to pay for it. I submit the committee is hardly warranted by the information given to vote this additional Commissioner.

Mr. ADAIR. I find that the report of the committee here states that the principal trouble in prosecuting business is due to the fact that these Commissioners are compelled to go to remote parts of the islands at different intervals and remain for a number of weeks. If a new member of this Commission is created under this law, could not this Commissioner be required, within his duties, to go to the various parts of the islands, and would it make it any more easy to obtain a quorum than it now is?

Mr. SHERLEY. That might or might not be so, according to the duties of the Commissioner.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is it not true that the Resident Commissioners here from the Philippine Islands, representing conflicting political views in the islands, unite in the request for this additional appointment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have been told that that is so, but the gentleman, who has some familiarity with the archipelago, will understand that there is of course a desire on the part of the Filipino people to have as large a representation of their own race in the office-holding class as possible, and that reason might be sufficient to warrant them in supporting this bill, but the gentleman will also know that the danger that confronts us in our treatment of the archipelago is the creation of an unnecessarily complicated government. And you are asking to increase the heads of that government one, to make them from eight into nine.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The point I want to make is this: That when the conflicting political views of the people in the islands unite in saying this is necessary for the proper administration of the government, and they pay the bill, why ought we not to consent to it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not if the reason for it is the reason suggested by me.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I did not demand a second on this bill simply to consume forty minutes of time. I did it because of my opposition to the bill itself. I am opposed to creating any more commissions or commissioners. Congress seems to have gone daft on the subject of delegating powers and creating commissions and bureaus. Why, a short time ago there was a great hullabaloo to the effect that we wanted a tariff commission, and I am very happy to say that I thoroughly agreed with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] against the creation of a tariff commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is aware, is he not, that the bill passed the Senate without any opposition at all?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With all due respect to the Senate, I say that is a very feeble argument. Here lately there has been a proposition to appoint a financial commission. I undertake to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that you can appoint a financial commission and send it around the country, which when it gets back will know as much about the finances as Mr. HILL of Connecticut knows now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They will be very fortunate if they know half as much as he does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are 92 Senators and 391 Representatives in Congress for? They are supposed to have information on these subjects when they come here, and if they did not have they ought not to have come here; and if they want any more information, let them go to work and dig it out.

The upshot of this performance will be that you will just simply make one good, fat office for one more man, and he will have a lot of employees, stenographers, messengers, and hangers-on. I am opposed to the creating of any more commissions, any more bureaus to get information that we all have, or can easily get, and to discharge the duties that we ourselves ought to discharge.

Now I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall use the whole five minutes. I am told that under the provisions of this measure the majority of the Philippine Commission will be Filipinos. Now, I understand that is a new departure in the administration of our insular possessions. In Porto Rico a majority of the Commissioners are not Porto Ricans, and I apprehend that the reason why the gentlemen who represent the Philippine Islands here as Commissioners favor this proposition is because it gives to the Commission one more Filipino. I suppose that is the real ground for their favoring the measure.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, it is urged that this measure ought to pass, in order to furnish a quorum in all cases. It seems to me that it is just as easy to get a quorum with the Commission as presently organized, as it would be with the addition of this new member, or if this be not true, then, the better plan would be to reduce the Commissioners by deducting one.

Then, I notice another provision in the bill, for which I oppose the measure also, that he shall receive the same salary and emoluments as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by law. I suppose that is the real reason for the passage of this measure, to create a Federal office for some other Federal officeholder, for some other pie hunter, for some other man who wants a place.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there? This is unanimously reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs, and I think every one of that committee will tell you, if you want to ask them, that the man who will unquestionably be appointed is a Filipino, a splendid lawyer, and a most excellent man in every way, and that his services are absolutely needed in order to——

Mr. CLAYTON. How does the gentleman know, in the inscrutable ways of Providence and of the present occupant of the White House—how can he tell who is going to be appointed? And if you are making provision for some particular man, why not put it in your measure? Why do you not name him?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Because we do not want by legislation to name a commissioner.

Mr. CLAYTON. But you are absolutely certain that the man is already picked out for this place, and you are creating a special office for some particular individual. If you are going to create an office for a particular individual, I want to know who the man is who is going to get it. I want to help the President and the Senate in filling this office. I want to know the proposed appointee. Who is the man that the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, he is the present attorney-general of the Philippines, as I understand.

Mr. CLAYTON. Has he a name?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Araneta. He is a Filipino.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is he not already doing this work?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, not at all; and will the gentleman permit me just a word right there?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Ocampo, one of the Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, represents one party; Mr. Legarde, a business man of large wealth, represents the other party. Both these gentlemen say that it is absolutely necessary, in their judgment, for the proper running of the Philippine government to have this Commissioner.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no doubt they say it is necessary in their judgment, but in my judgment it is not absolutely necessary, and this pie brigade is already large enough, and I do not think the House ought to increase the membership now provided, by pressing new ones upon the President. Let us give the Filipinos self-government and independence and save the time of the American Congress and the tax money of the American people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he is going to use all the remainder of his time in one speech?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I will ask you to consume some of your time now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the present Commission consists of eight members, two of whom are Filipinos, and the other six are American citizens. It is proposed to give one more, which will make nine, and of course it will be much easier to get a quorum, because it now takes five to make a quorum, and it will only take five to make a quorum when there are nine. Some of the departments are overcrowded with business, and it is necessary for the proper government of the islands that there should be one more executive department. It is necessary, as I found on my visit there, for members of the Commission to visit the outlying islands, and it takes a couple of months or more to make their visit. While they are away it is quite essential that there should still be a quorum left in Manila. We have lately added an assembly, which is the lower house of legislature, and no law can be passed unless it passes the assembly.

Formerly the Commission were the sole law making power. It would seem there is no reason why this bill should not be passed. Mr. Legarda was a member of the Commission from the time of its inception until appointed Commissioner Resident to the United States. The other gentleman representing the islands here is a gentleman well known throughout the islands, a gentleman of education, a lawyer, and a man of ability.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many Commissioners did we have when all this war and bloodshed was going on over there?

Mr. PAYNE. We did not have a civil commission then; it was after the war was ended that a civil commission was appointed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, Mr. Taft and Mr. Luke E. Wright were Commissioners then.

Mr. PAYNE. There was a commission appointed under the War Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many composed it?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not remember how many there were then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think it was five, and now you want six—one more in time of peace than you had in time of war.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri use the remainder of his time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is evidently a good deal of misunderstanding about this matter on the other side. My colleague says there are six Americans and two Filipinos on the Commission. The report says there are three Filipinos. The gentleman from Indiana states that they desire to create this new department. I asked why they do not provide for the department in the bill itself. He replies that Secretary Taft states that while he believes it should be done, it has not yet been determined that it shall be created. It seems to me that if we could go a little further perhaps we might have some more inconsistent statements about the bill. In 1902 the act ratifying the action of the President creating the Philippine Commission was enacted by Congress. It consists of twenty-one pages in the general Statutes at Large. It goes minutely into the affairs of the Philippine government; yet the gentleman from Indiana states that Congress is incompetent to determine how many departments there should be, and which particular bureau should be in each department.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me? Returning to the matter of the personnel of this Commission, will you explain your statement as to the inaccurate statement in that regard made by your colleague from New York and the gentleman from Indiana? Will you please tell the House how many of the present Commissioners are Filipinos and how many are Americans, who does the work for the Commission, or who fails to do his duty and makes it necessary to have another Commissioner?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The report says:

The proposed increase in the membership of the Commission is greatly desired by the Commissioners themselves, including its three Filipino members.

The report further states that it is desired to appoint in the place of one of the Resident Commissioners to this country a Filipino and a Filipino to this new position. If that were done, the Commission would consist of four Filipinos and four Americans. It occurs to me that perhaps the reason an additional Commissioner is desired is to prevent what the gentleman from Alabama was led to believe existed—that the Filipinos would have a majority in the Commission. If the Commission be not increased, and if there were four Filipinos and four Americans, there might be a division upon lines undesirable.

But why not, Mr. Speaker, reduce the number of Commissioners? If it is desired to avoid the possibility of a tie vote, why not, instead of increasing the Commission from eight to nine, reduce it to seven? The objection I have to this bill particularly is, however, that I do not believe that the circumstances warrant Congress in delegating authority to the Executive that should be exercised by the Congress. Is not the Committee on Insular Affairs, after six or eight years' service and investigation, able to determine just what the character of the legislation in the Philippine Islands should be, or how the various departments should be divided, or how the various bureaus should be assigned? It seems to me the committee should be able to determine these questions. I am not willing to concede that Congress is unable, as the gentleman from Indiana claims, to determine, after full investigation and full information, how the various bureaus of the government should be distributed among the several departments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is not to create an office for any particular person. The purpose of the bill is to create an office to increase the efficiency of administration and legislation in the archipelago. Gentlemen must bear in mind the fact that the Philippine Commission is a legislative body. It has almost plenary legislative power; it is a branch of the legislative department in the archipelago, and I think every man in this House will agree with me in the view that too many executive officers in a legislative body is not conducive to impartial and wise legislation. If one of the four members of the Commission who now only have legislative functions should acquire also executive functions the executive branch of the government would practically make or dictate all the laws of the archipelago.

Is a body of nine members too large to assist in the enactment of laws in the archipelago? There are only two natives now on the Commission; and if the purpose of the Secretary of War and the President, if this bill should be enacted into law, is carried out, they may appoint another native, and then there will be three natives and six Americans, five executive officers and four members of the Commission whose duties are purely and solely legislative.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, then, does the gentleman in the report state that there are three natives now on the board?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That statement in the report is an error. The Committee on Insular Affairs, like the Committee on Appropriations, consults men who are familiar with the subject-matter of legislation. I submit that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], able and well informed as he is, knows comparatively little personally of the workings of the great Departments of the Government for which he assists in making appropriations. He consults the heads of the Departments and men engaged in the service and acts upon their advice, and the Committee on Insular Affairs does identically the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that I act upon my own judgment after getting information from men representing the Departments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Committee on Insular Affairs does the same thing. It acts upon its own judgment, based upon the advice and opinion of those in a position to know.

The SPEAKER. The time of both gentlemen has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just counted; 156 Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. All those in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" those opposed "nay;" those present and not voting will answer "present;" and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 127, nays 100, answered "present" 10, not voting 150, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, May 3, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. and was called to order by the Clerk, Hon. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, who caused the following communication from the Speaker to be read:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1908.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore for this day.

JOSEPH G. CANNON. Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in Heaven, for the immutability of Thy character, that Thou art the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; that we are Thy children; that we may rely implicitly upon Thine infinite wisdom, power, and goodness, and that whatsoever Thou dost order for us is better than anything we could desire for ourselves. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in His law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."

We thank Thee, our Father, for the great and the true, the wise and the pure, the strong and the brave of every age, who comprehended the light which shone out of the darkness and the meaning of life, caught its spirit, and gave themselves in a faithful service to Thee and to mankind. We are gathered here to-day to pay a tribute of love and respect to two such men—men in whom their fellows reposed confidence and trust, who never deceived, never betrayed that confidence, but lived pure, noble, exemplary lives, and wrought a good work for mankind. Grant that their lives may be an inspiration to us and to those who shall come after us. And bless, we pray Thee, those who were near and dear to them in life, and comfort them with the blessed thought that they shall meet again in a land where love shall find its full fruition in the hearts of the true and the pure. And so may our lives be ordered that we shall be counted worthy in the day of our departure. And Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

MALLORY, shall be set apart for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM J. BRYAN, late United States Senator." (Order adopted in the House April 23, 1908.)

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who may address the House to-day have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all Members addressing the House to-day may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE SENATOR MALLORY.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration and adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] submits the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in accordance with the order of the day, an opportunity be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. STEPHEN R. MALLORY, late a United States Senator from the State of Florida.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question in on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled on this occasion to perform one of those sad duties that have become so frequent here during the past few years, that of paying tribute to the life and character of some Member of this body or of that at the other end of the Capitol, who has answered the summons from on high, to which all must give heed and from which none can turn away. All alike—the rich and the poor, the powerful and the weak, the sovereign and the subject—must obey that summons. No station so high as to be above its reach, none so low as to lie beneath the compass of its sound. How frequently, in this body, are we reminded of this sad truth. How often at each session do we pause in the proceedings here to commemorate the life and services of some one who, in advance of us, has answered the call to go hence.

I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who regard services such as these an idle waste of time. On the contrary, I think we can not use more profitably the brief period necessary to pay loving tribute to those honored by the people with commissions to serve them in the National Legislature, and who have gone down before the grim reaper in the midst of their duties and ere their work here has been done.

True we can not, if we would, bring the dead back to life by aught we may say here, no more than the flower dropped upon the casket or the high pealing anthem above the bier can lift the coffin lid and restore to those who remain behind the departed friend or companion. But they all serve a purpose in life. They soften the gloom of the death chamber and make lighter the burden of bereavement. Touching, as these simple acts do, the more delicate cords of our nature, they make us better and purer and strengthen the bonds of sympathy that link all human hearts together.

Then, too, the country at large derives a benefit in other ways from such proceedings as these. By them we not only stimulate patriotism, broaden our political horizon, and temper the asperities engendered by party strife, but, by spreading upon the records here the history of an honored and illustrious career, to be read from one end of the land to the other, we kindle the ambition of the young in every walk of life and stimulate them to nobler effort and grander achievement.

No one has ever accomplished aught in any field of endeavor without having been inspired thereto by some one, and few lives are so barren of results as not to furnish a stimulus to still more worthy action by those who may come under their influence. A gifted poet has said:

There's never a rose in all the world
But makes some green spray sweeter;
There's never a wind in all the sky
But makes some bird's wing fleeter;
There's never a star but brings to heaven
Some silver radiance tender,
And never a rosy cloud but helps
To crown the sunset splendor;
No robin but may thrill some heart,
His dawnlike gladness voicing.
God gives us all some small, sweet way
To set the world rejoicing.

And in that gem-laden poem, Lucile, Owen Meredith gives utterance to the same truth in the following lines:

No stream from its source flows seaward, how lowly soever its course,
But what some land is gladdened; no star ever rose
And set without influence somewhere; no life
Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife
And all life not be stronger and purer thereby.

And, sir, if influences for good may flow from humble sources, how much greater results may come from the contemplation of the life and character of one such as we are assembled here to commemorate.

I can not, perhaps, do better, Mr. Speaker, than to quote a short paragraph from the address by the deceased himself. Eulogizing the life and character of the late James Montraville Moody in the Senate a little more than five years ago, Senator MALLORY used this language:

Mr. President, it is a natural impulse that prompts those who, by association or observation, have learned the intrinsic merit of one who has closed a life of usefulness, to pay such tribute as can be conveyed by our inadequate powers of expression to the memory of such a career. When Death has placed his imprimatur on the last chapter of our little earthly life story, and what we have done for good or ill has thereby become fixed forever, a part of our irrevocable and unamendable record, it is eminently proper that not only those who have the incentive of personal affection, but that those who in the casual intercourse of a strenuous existence have had occasion to note exceptional and shining traits in the character and career of one who has passed away forever, should also put in as permanent a shape as possible the results of their observation. This impulse ought to have, and generally does have, with the thoughtful a higher and nobler inspiration than that which evolved the maxim of the ancients which enjoined nought but good when speaking of the dead. Example is the most potent of preceptors. The object lesson is the most impressive method of reaching the understanding and shaping the inclination of the young, and the oftener we can present to their plastic minds authentic illustrations of character which of itself conquers adverse environment, rises to eminence by its innate merit and wins the respect and esteem of good men and women the greater the probability of our inspiring those who are to follow us with a zealous purpose of emulating such virtue.

Senator MALLORY'S life is one well worthy of being studied. While he had not reached its allotted span nor passed much beyond its meridian, he had trodden the pathway of duty and had lived long, if life be counted by achievement rather than by the flight of years. Although springing from an honored and distinguished parentage, he had, by reason of adverse conditions, been compelled to start well down in the humbler walks of life. But, by his own unaided efforts, had climbed, one at a time, the steep heights of success until he had reached the goal of his ambition, the highest point, save one, that may be touched in the field of political endeavor, and that too without a stain upon his life or a blot upon his character. How much, then, may we, whether young or old, learn from a career so filled with bright achievement.

STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY was born on November 2, 1848, in Columbia, S. C., where his parents were sojourning temporarily—their home being in Key West, Fla., from which city they subsequently moved to Pensacola. He sprang from English and Irish stock on his father's side, his paternal grandmother having been a Miss Russell and a cousin of Lord Russell, of England, and from Spanish lineage on his mother's side—she having been a Miss Moreno, a lady distinguished for her many qualities, both of mind and heart. His father was a man of marked ability, and, elected to the United States Senate from Florida in 1851, served the people in that high position until his State seceded, in 1861, when he resigned from the Senate, becoming afterwards secretary of the navy in the cabinet of Jefferson Davis, there likewise discharging his duties with distinction until the star of the Southern Confederacy "went down forever in smoke and blood."

Nor did the son escape the hardships and perils of that bloodiest of conflicts. Being then at school in Richmond, the Confederate capital, and where his father's official position had required him to reside, the son, at the call of what he conceived to be the voice of duty, entered Lee's army at the age of 15 years; later being transferred to the navy, in which he served as a midshipman on the Patrick Henry until the surrender of Lee at Appomattox, when he returned to Pensacola. But only for a brief period did he remain there at this time, for we soon find him at Georgetown University, in this city, from which he graduated in due time, with distinction. Being without financial means, his father's fortune having been dissipated, as so many fortunes were in that disastrous war, he became a professor of classic languages in the university from which he had graduated, teaching there for two years, when he removed to New Orleans and began the study of law, supporting himself the while by teaching school. Admitted to the bar in Louisiana, he returned to Florida in 1874, where he commenced the practice of his profession, in which he took at once a commanding position, and that, too, at a bar ever noted for the ability, learning, and high standing of its membres.

But he was not permitted long to follow without interruption the profession he had chosen. The people of his county, indeed of the State, had a use for his services in the political field. In 1876, a period in Florida as well as over the entire South when partisan feeling ran high, he was elected to the lower house of the Florida legislature, where his talents and high character at once placed him in the front rank of Florida's public men, a position he ever afterwards retained.

Elected to the State senate in 1880, he was reelected in 1884, all the while continuing the practice of law, except when engaged in the performance of his official duties. In 1890 he was elected to the Fifty-second Congress and reelected to the Fifty-third, serving the people with that fidelity and conscientious regard for duty which characterized him throughout his entire life. From his seat in this body he retired to private life at the end of the Fifty-third Congress, broken in health but not in spirit, still with the determination to give the best that was within him to the world in which he lived. His retirement, however, was not to be for long, for in 1897 he was elected to the United States Senate, and reelected without opposition in 1903, serving well the State whose commission he bore until death laid its hand upon him on December 23, 1907.

This, Mr. Speaker, is but an outline of a remarkable career, but from it, even if we knew no more, we might easily fill the space within. I have only touched the more prominent elevations along his pathway, but from these resting places we can easily discern the difficulties of the course he trod, and picture to ourselves his struggles to surmount them, until finally he reached the goal of his ambition, the highest point for which he strove.

A soldier at 15 under the greatest chieftain of the South in one of the most gigantic struggles the world has ever witnessed; a civil war veteran at 17; a graduate and professor in one of the first colleges of the country at the age of 21; a lawyer with a large practice in the city where his childhood had been spent at 26; a member of the lower house of the legislature of his State at 28; twice a State senator between then and his thirty-sixth year; twice a Congressman ere he had reached the age of 45, and then with broken health ten years in the greatest lawmaking body in the world; finally, after years of physical suffering, yielding to the ravages of disease and falling under its pitiless assaults, but with earthly honors thick upon him; these show not only a remarkable career, but indicate the traits which gave success—commanding talents, honorable ambition, singleness of purpose, energy in the discharge of duty, unyielding determination, and a well-rounded character.

It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to know Senator MALLORY intimately, and particularly after he had been honored with a seat in the Senate. I have seen him in private and public life, have met him in the social circle, accompanied him in political campaigns, observed him in the performance of his official duties at the other end of this Capitol, and know full well the qualifications he possessed for the work demanded of him and the fidelity with which he served those who had intrusted their interests to his keeping. But if I were asked to specify the leading trait in his character, I would unhesitatingly say that it was a high sense of honor. No political or other exigency could make him swerve from what he conceived to be the path of right.

The voice of the tempter is heard in all the walks of life. With no less frequency, perhaps, is it whispered in the ear of him engaged in civil strife, and the temptation to sacrifice convictions to political exigency is sometimes great, but fortunate is that constituency represented by one who, with an honest heart and a clear head, will, seeing the right, dare to do it in the face of the probable disapproval of that public on whom he relies for support.

That trait the subject of this sketch possessed in a high degree. Mistakes he may have made now and then in the support of men and measures. Who has not made them? But if such there were, they were of the head and not of the heart. And in saying that, Mr. Speaker, I have perhaps said all that is necessary to be said of STEPHEN R. MALLORY. For he who possesses this characteristic can ever be trusted by those he serves. In the life of such a man, the conditions being given, friend and foe alike will know what his action will be. With the star of right to guide him, he ever moves on a straight line to the end of the way.

Another characteristic of Senator MALLORY'S, which, after all, is but one of the many aspects of a high sense of honor, was his fidelity to his State and the people he represented. He ever had their interest before him and never lost an opportunity to serve them when able to do so. I have referred, Mr. Speaker, to the condition of his health. Indeed, he entered the Senate in 1897 an invalid and never afterwards did he regain his accustomed vigor. Often, to appearances, near death's door, he remained at his post of duty, except when compelled to absent himself on account of the severity of the disease from which he suffered. Going in and out of the Senate Chamber, but a shadow of his once strong and robust physique, though his body might be racked by pain and weakened by fever, he never failed to respond to the request of a constituent, no matter how humble or obscure, when able to leave his bed. Frequently I have seen him in the Senate Chamber with a high fever participating in the deliberations of that body, or at the Departments serving some friend or constituent, when prudence and a proper regard for his waning health and strength should have kept him in his room.

But his sense of duty was such as to cause him to disregard his physical condition as long as an obligation claimed by a constituent or imposed by his official position remained undischarged. With him duty was first, everything else, including health and physical comfort, secondary. Knowing of his ill health and the drain which disease and suffering had made upon his strength, I have wondered at his ability to perform so well his official duties. Besides attending to his correspondence and departmental work, he kept well up with the proceedings of the Senate—often engaging in the discussions of that body. In fact, there was scarcely a great measure before the Senate while he was a member there upon which he did not speak and which was not rendered more lucid by his utterances.

Senator MALLORY, while a partisan, was not a bitter one, and although his arguments were presented with force, his kindness of heart was such that his language left nothing to rankle in the heart of an adversary. While standing firmly by his convictions, he was magnanimous and liberal to all. He was not quick to take offense, and never intentionally wounded the sensibilities of another. He was always in earnest—never a trifler—but regarding every subject at all worthy of his consideration, as meriting his best effort, he conducted the discussions in which he engaged upon a high plane.

Such in part, Mr. Speaker, were the leading characteristics of S. R. MALLORY. But he is gone. As the last eventful days of 1907 were slipping away into the centuries that have passed his spirit laid aside its wasted abode of flesh and took its flight to the God who gave it. But though with us no more, his memory still lingers in our hearts. Indeed, such a life is never lost in death nor buried in the grave, but passes out upon the years to cheer mankind as the centuries go by. The world is better for his having lived in it, and rich indeed is the heritage of those he left behind or who may come after him. Of him it may be truly said he left—

Footprints on the sands of time.

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother
Seeing, shall take heart again.

[Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, my first acquaintance with STEPHEN R. MALLORY began in December, 1891, when he entered the Fifty-second Congress as a Representative from the southern district of Florida He came here when his party was in the full flush of victory. The McKinley tariff act became a law on the 6th of October, 1890, and the election was held only a month later, before the act had gotten into full operation. Its various provisions were magnified by the imaginations of the people and there was a universal feeling and apprehension that prices on all commodities would be enormously high under its operations. I remember well seeing large placards in the stores announcing that certain goods would be sold at a certain price and that now was the time to buy, because on the next invoice they would be compelled to advance the price 25 per cent because of the operations of the McKinley law. There was no partisanship either in the display of these placards, because they were seen as frequently in stores owned by Republicans as those of the opposition party. The result was an overwhelming Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, elected in the fall of 1890; and in 1892 his party came into full power in both the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

Here was a great opportunity for a newly elected Member. Mr. MALLORY was fresh from service in both houses of the Florida legislature. He had a mind well trained in statecraft. Yet being a new Member he was largely overshadowed by many of the old-time leaders in his party, and with his naturally modest and retiring disposition did not bring himself so much to the front as he would have done under other circumstances. I got to know him well during his service here in the House, although we were not on the same committee in any instance. He was of gentlemanly disposition, of friendly nature, a man of warm friendship, and always courteous in his bearing and intercourse with his fellow Members.

He was defeated for renomination in 1894 by the present popular and able Representative from that district, the Hon. STEPHEN M. SPARKMAN. The success of Mr. SPARKMAN was a tribute to his wide popularity in the district. But it is a great tribute to the character of Mr. MALLORY that though defeated for Congress in 1894 he was elected to the Senate in 1896 for the term commencing March 4, 1897. He at once took high rank in that body as a patient, persistent, hard-working Senator, a man who looked for results and not for oratorical display. He did not bring himself into the lime light, but was content to work out quietly his plans, with the result of unusual success. He was reelected to the Senate in 1902, having been renominated by a vote in the primaries without opposition. His fatal illness overtook him in November last, and the subsequent days of his life marked his character for industry and devotion to duty. His last speech was delivered in this city on the Sunday evening before his sickness, and the last article from his pen was completed only a few hours before he was stricken with his fatal malady. He fully realized the condition of his health some time before his death, as he declined to be a candidate for reelection to the Senate and also declined any position of chairmanship of a committee in the Senate. His last request showed the simplicity of his life; he desired that no committee be appointed to attend upon his funeral and that the services be of the simplest character.

It is a remarkable fact in the career of Mr. MALLORY that he enlisted in the Confederate army at the age of 15 years and became a midshipman in the Confederate navy in the spring of 1865. He retired as a veteran of the war at the age of 17 years. Mr. MALLORY'S devotion at this early age to the Confederate cause is but a fair example of the fealty of the men of the South during those sad and bloody years of fratricidal strife. In common with millions of his countrymen he believed the cause of the South was right, although this belief is now generally conceded to have been a mistaken one as to the question of whether the United States was a nation or simply a confederacy; yet all are willing to concede the general good faith of those adopting the latter view who risked their lives in their vain endeavor to sustain it. Now everywhere their valor is recognized. The heroism which sent boys at 15, or even younger, into the field side by side with old men, tottering on the verge of the grave, showed a sturdy determination and valor never surpassed in history. However we may differ on other questions relating to the war of the sixties, none of us can forget that these men were Americans, and well illustrated the fighting blood shed on every field from Lexington to San Juan Hill.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, on occasions like this we are impressed with a sense of the narrowness of the round of life—a rejoicing over the advent into existence in this world, a buffeting of its billows and a braving of its storms, an enduring of its trials and a sharing of its joys and triumphs for a brief period, and then scenes like this, where the survivors gather to pay tribute to those who are gone.

The subject of our memorial remarks had quite a remarkable career. Into few lives is there crowded so much of history as may be written about the man of whom we speak to-day. A soldier, a sailor, a legislator in each branch of the legislature of his State, a Member of this House of Representatives, and a member of the Senate of the United States, and yet death reached him before old age had come, and when he had but by little passed his meridian. Into few lives is crowded so much of work and of glory. To but few is it given to render so much of public service.

I came to Congress at the time Senator MALLORY entered this House. I served with him in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, and in that time came to know him quite well. As others have remarked, he was modest and unostentatious in the discharge of his duties. His effort seemed to be to find the right side of questions and to adhere to the right as he saw it.

The devotion of his State to him and the signal manner in which it honored him is evidence of itself that he served the people of that State, both in his Congressional district, and, afterwards, in the State at large, faithfully and well.

It is a comparatively rare thing for son to succeed father, directly or remotely, in the membership of this House. It is still more rare for son to follow father in membership at the other end of this Capitol. It is a notable fact that the service of the son in the Senate in this instance is about equal in length of years to the Senatorial service of the father a generation earlier.

What an amount of history was made in the period during which this young man was upon the boards as an actor in life! In that time was our great civil war, one of the mighty conflicts not only of modern times but of all time, and he was an actor in its scenes, both upon land and upon sea. The events of that war were so tremendous, the results of it are so far-reaching that even those of us who may have given the most thought to the subject perhaps but feebly comprehend the full significance of what then happened, and what has resulted and what will result from what then happened.

In another respect the career of Senator MALLORY is somewhat remarkable, because in the death chain his name is linked forever with the name of his successor. It is surely an extraordinary and perhaps an unprecedented event that upon the same day, in the same Chamber, tributes are paid to the memory of a departed Senator and to the memory of another departed Senator who followed him, his immediate successor in the Senate and in death. With what audacity does Death tread upon the heels of Life! How fleeting is earthly existence, and how rapidly are the scenes shifted!

The vacancy in the Senate made by Senator MALLORY'S death was filled by the appointment of young Mr. BRYAN. He came here in the flush and strength of young manhood, and yet in a few weeks mourning friends followed him to his last resting place, as mourning friends had followed his predecessor to the tomb; and to-day in this Chamber tribute will be paid to his memory as well as to the memory of the Senator who preceded him in office and in death.

Senator MALLORY'S abilities were of a solid, substantial, and accomplishing kind, if I may use the expression. A modest man, he never sought display and never attempted it. His purposes were high, and the means by which he tried to accomplish them were worthy of the ends in view. His aim was to serve faithfully those who intrusted him with public duties and to advance their interests in this Capitol and elsewhere, and without exaggeration and without favor or partiality we may well say his services were faithful and efficient.

It is often a matter of curious study as to who accomplishes most in a given forum in this life and what means are the best for the accomplishment of desired results. Perhaps each can accomplish best the task set before him by his own methods and in his own ways, by the employment of his talents in the ways that are natural for him, because the natural ways of each of us are better for each than the superior ways of others which me might try to copy or follow.

This man, not gifted with extraordinary brilliancy, not possessed of display talents, used faithfully and persistently, honestly and courageously the substantial talents which were given him; and the faithful use of these is what results in the attainment of the desirable things of life. Brilliancy dazzles momentarily, startles, perhaps gratifies, but steady work—steady persistence in the pursuit of an object, steady aim in the accomplishment of what is laid out for accomplishment—that is what produces results, that is what in the main makes the world better, advances a good cause, and retards that which is bad.

Some are of the opinion that services and exercises such as these are merely formal and ought to be dispensed with. I am not of that mind. I believe that it is worth while for us in this everyday, plodding life of ours to throw in a dash of sentiment where we can. Life is an extraordinary mingling of tragedy and comedy, the most wonderful thing of which we can conceive, the one wonderful thing of which we have experience from our entrance into it until our departure from it. It is entirely fitting that those associated with a worthy man in his life and in his work when he is gone should turn aside from their everyday performances to pay a tribute of respect to his memory, a tribute that may be paid honestly because it is richly merited. Of course the departed is neither benefited nor injured by what we say here, nor by our failure to say anything. He is gone beyond the realm of temporal things. Temporal voices no longer reach his ear, temporal concerns no longer command his attention. It is rather for us and for those who follow after us, it is rather in the example and effect upon humanity in general, that exercises like these have their meaning and use.

It is no idle ceremony to pay tribute to the memory of such a man as Senator MALLORY; an honest, sincere, worthy man, honored far beyond the average of American citizenship; notable by the honors heaped upon him, and by his conduct so worthy of them. In him we have lost a friend and coadjutor in the work of good government; and in our several ways and with our varying lights, blinded sometimes and warped by our prejudices, in the main, I like to believe, we seek good government and its good results. One who battled with us and who wrought by our side, one who was a helper and a friend, is gone; and in a comparatively short time—for life is fleeting, and soon the longest life ends—we who are yet in the flesh shall have performed our part in life, well or ill, and also shall have gone hence.

May it be our good fortune when the time comes for kind, loving friends to say something concerning us, to have such records that they may honestly speak well of us, as we this day may honestly speak well of him to whose memory we would pay the tribute of abiding reverence.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to speak at length of the life, character, and services of Senator MALLORY. That privilege belongs properly to those who knew him longer and more intimately than I did. I do desire, however, to pay a brief tribute to one whose whole career was characterized by a splendid integrity and an absolute fidelity. When he passed away a great loss came to his State and section, but more than that, Mr. Speaker, a great loss came to his country. The sorrow felt by his friends, neighbors, and associates was shared by those who lived in more distant parts of our land and who admired and respected this brave and useful man.

In the fall of 1864 he was but a boy of 15 years, yet he enlisted in the Confederate service and fought for the cause in which he believed until the war was over. He then taught school and studied law. He had, however, hardly entered upon the practice of his profession when he was elected to the lower house of the Florida legislature, and for ten years was a member of that body and of the State senate. So satisfactory was his record there that his constituents sent him to Washington as a Member of the House of Representatives. He had been a United States Senator since 1897.

Practically his whole life, therefore, was given to the public service. He had the entire confidence of the people of Florida, and in return he gave them the best that was in him. He was an intense patriot. He loved his Southland, and during the days of civil strife showed that he was willing, if need be, to die for its people. His military record was marked by fidelity and fearlessness. When the war came to an end he showed like fearlessness in confronting the distressing difficulties which followed it. From that hour he devoted himself with all his might not alone to bettering local conditions, but to the welfare of the whole country. And how eagerly have those associated with him in public life testified to the signal ability with which he discharged his duties.

Senator MALLORY was brave, courteous, kindly, the very soul of honor; in a word, he was a true Southern gentleman. I have listened with great interest to the affectionate and eloquent tributes which have been paid to him to-day, and I was especially touched by the reference made by my friend [Mr. SPARKMAN] to the pluck and determination shown by Senator MALLORY in pressing steadfastly on with his work in spite of ill health. There was something very thrilling in that recital of daily battle with disease by one who "though his body might be racked by pain and weakened by fever, never failed to respond to the request of a constituent, no matter how humble or obscure." I think we do not always realize how much of heroism there is in such a life. It calls for a finer courage than that shown upon the battlefield. Companionship with a man who carries cheerfulness with him and goes on with his work in spite of physical ills is inspiring. It drives away melancholy, and makes the world a better place to live in. I have also been impressed by the many references to his rugged honesty. In these days, when there have been revelations of dishonor in public and private life which have shocked and alarmed us, it is indeed uplifting to contemplate the life of a man whose record is without stain.

Mr. Speaker, a strong man has gone; a life of rare usefulness is ended; the record is made up. As the years pass by, it will be realized more and more clearly how great is our loss. A noble constituency which he served so devotedly and unselfishly can be depended upon to see to it that such service is ever gratefully remembered.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the friends and admirers of STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY, late a Senator from the State of Florida, received a great shock on December 23 last when the news of his death at his home in Pensacola, Fla., was flashed across the wires.

That shock settled into a deep and profund sorrow as we here and elsewhere came to a full realization of the great loss we had sustained.

The hearts of countless numbers became and are filled with mourning because of his passing away. This House, of which he was twice an honored Member, took fitting and proper action on his death when notice of same was received, and meets to-day to permit its Members to pay a last final tribute to his memory. Some, more gifted in speech and beautiful thought, will sing his praises and sound his virtues in grander and more harmonious tones than others less gifted can do, but the heart of each will be in his song and each song will be a song of love, for Senator MALLORY was beloved by all who knew him.

So far as he is concerned our exercises this day are vain and futile. He has solved the mystery of life and of death and is beyond the reach of our words. We can not contribute to his happiness or his glory, nor can we by our most affectionate thoughts or tenderest words provoke the faintest sign of recognition from him. He has passed from our midst and the things that are earthly concern him no more.

As he could not in life by taking thought add a single cubit to his stature, so we today by taking thought can not add to the stature of manhood and of fame that he for himself carved out of the life that was given him to live.

We pay honor therefore to his memory with no thought save that of paying honor where honor is due, and in truth by that which we do we but honor ourselves.

It has been truly written that "it is not all of life to live nor all of death to die." We know the former; we believe the latter. We need not enter the realm of speculation nor invoke our religious faith to know that it is not all of life to live. Poor indeed would be the life that at its closing could point to no other achievement than that of mere existence, and poorer still would be our great country if the lives that have made it glorious had been pitifully empty and useless lives. But it is not all of life to live, when that living has been filled with mighty deeds and crowned with works of beneficence, for such a life in the hearts and minds of those who knew it lives on and on.

The grave marks the ending of the physical life, but there is no ending there of memory, and a man's works live after him. The influence of a good and useful life furnishes hope and courage and is an inspiration to nobler and better things. This influence for neither its beginning nor its ending takes any note of the hour when the life that gave it birth passes from time into eternity. It was such a life that Senator MALLORY lived, and it is because of it that now, when his physical life is ended, we meet to utter words of love and praise about him. The short sketch of him that appears in our directory but faintly reveals the busy and useful life he lived. It shows, however, that he was called to many positions of honor and trust, and those who knew him know that he was faithful and true in every instance. Before he was 16 years of age he became a volunteer in the Confederate army to do battle for his beloved Southland, and from that hour until his last expiring breath he was loyal to the noblest and best traditions of the people he loved and the people who loved him.

One by one the old soldiers of the South, who, after the "bloody conflict," were called to the patriotic service of a reunited country are passing away.

The roll call on the other side of the river is lengthening, while here it is growing shorter and shorter. One of the last to leave us and to swell the great majority on the other side was Senator MALLORY.

We grieve and lament his departure, while hosannas of joy welcomed his answering "present" to the roll call over there. No better or more efficient or more loyal service to the Stars and Stripes has been rendered here than has come from these old soldiers of the South, and among them all there has not been one more patriotic nor one more consecrated to duty than Senator MALLORY. He was a scholarly man, and his mind was a great storehouse of learning. He was fitted by nature, by inheritance, and by training for the great work of statesmanship. His people recognized this, and for almost half of the fifty-nine years he lived he was engaged in the arduous and exacting work of making laws. He served in both branches of his State legislature, and he served in both branches of the Congress of the United States. He knew the science of government as but few men learn it, and the Constitution was the chart and guide to which he clung at all times and in all cases.

He leaned to the school of strict constructionists, and he ever questioned the exercise of any power by Congress plain warrant for which could not be found in the written delegation of power. The sovereign State found in him a stanch defender, and no knightlier blade was ever drawn in defense of a just cause than that drawn by him in defense of what he believed to be the reserved power of the States. So gentle, however, was he in thought, and so polished and persuasive in phrase and word, that no opponent met him but to admire and be disarmed. Whatever the result of the conflict, it left no feeling of enmity or resentment.

Senator MALLORY was not merely a student and defender of the Constitution, but he was a man of action and of deeds. He was a man of theories, but he put his theories into practice. The improvement of the harbors and the waterways of his State and country greatly interested him, and the results in this direction that he accomplished speaks a greater eulogy of his achievements than can any feeble words of mine. He was much concerned for the protection of the South from the invasion of yellow fever, and our present quarantine law is largely the result of his labors.

He was a stanch believer in the future of his State and of the South. He ever had before him not only their present greatness, but their greater possibilities, and whatever of law, whatever of speech, whatever of precept that lay within his power to induce the realization of these possibilities was ever at the service of his people. In all this he was neither sectional nor partisan. He was simply true to those who first reposed their trust in him, for truly his labors were not confined to his own section. He was a man of broad and national views and loved his whole country, and he served it all and served it well.

So clean was he in his methods and so uprightly did he walk in this body that he possessed the confidence and esteem of both sides; and as it was here, so it was in the upper House. He was the friend of all his associates and all his associates were his friends. He was by instinct a gentleman, and his courtesy was as unfailing as the atmosphere of honesty in which he lived. He was of kind and sympathetic disposition, and while he knew law and statesmanship and government he also knew people. He never lost sight of the individual, and was ever ready to extend a helping hand to the needy and distressed. While sick and suffering for many years before his death, no murmur of complaint came from his lips, but he was ever, in sickness as in health, the generous friend and the ready sympathizer. He gave aid and sympathy, but he sought neither for himself.

Quiet and unobtrusive, one had to know him to thoroughly appreciate him, but once knowing him his personality was impressive and those who knew him did not forget him.

But few who have served in this body knew the city of Washington so well as he. He was here as a student and here as a teacher long prior to his advent into political life. This capital city of the nation lost a friend when his life went out—a friend who not only knew and understood its needs, but who was powerful to aid. There are many in this city, as elsewhere, who have cause to remember his broad and catholic spirit, who know his work for and interest in the boys and girls of the country, and who know of his zealous efforts in the cause of education—a cause near and dear to him throughout his public career. His influence was ever on the side of the weak and helpless, and he left no stone unturned to carry education, to carry aid and sustenance to the dependent children of the land. In his death education has lost a friend, virtue and morality a stanch adherent, and his country a devoted, loyal son. In every walk of life, wherever he was known, his death is deplored; but while we deplore it, we, at the same time, rejoice that he was permitted to live and that we were permitted to know him.

[Mr. BURTON of Ohio addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the State of Florida has been unfortunate in losing two Senators within a short space of time. Indeed, the grim monster has played sad havoc in both Houses since this session of Congress began.

We are constantly reminded that we have here no continued city and that death is no respecter of persons.

In the death of STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY the State of Florida has lost a useful citizen, the Senate of the United States a valuable and distinguished member, and his colleagues in both Houses a warm-hearted and genial friend, whose splendid traits of character endeared him to all who enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance and friendship.

For several years I was thrown with him at the same table and in his room at the hotel where we both lived, and am therefore as well fitted to speak of his life and character as any Member of Congress outside of his own delegation.

I loved to hear him talk, and found inspiration and instruction in communion with him. We had much in common. We were both soldiers in the civil war—he in the Navy, I in the cavalry service. Being the elder of the two, I was longer in the service, for he entered at 15 years of age and was a veteran of that war at 17.

He often told me of riding around the defenses of Richmond when a mere lad of 13 years. He seemed to love every foot of ground around that historic and lovely city, and he knew many of the leading families of the place, who exhibited a fortitude and courage during four long years that has never been surpassed, if equaled, by any people in all the tide of time.

It is no wonder that after entering the Confederate army as a private, he subsequently entered the navy as a midshipman, for his distinguished father, of the same name, was the secretary of the Confederate navy during the four years of the war between the States. He had been a distinguished member of the United States Senate and chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and also a member of the Committee on Claims. He refused the appointment of minister to Spain in 1858. He also declined to serve as chief justice of the admiralty court of Florida when that State seceded from the Union. Jefferson Davis appointed him secretary of the navy which he accepted and held until the close of the war. It was here that he manifested the wisdom of the choice of the Confederate president, for he succeeded in organizing a navy where none had previously existed. In proof of the wisdom of this choice and the work performed I quote a monograph by Major Gorgas. He says:

> We began, in April, 1861, without an arsenal, laboratory, or powder mill of any capacity, and with no foundry or rolling mill except at Richmond, and before the close of 1863, within a little over two years, we supplied them. During the harassments of war, while holding our own in the field defiantly and successfully against a powerful enemy—crippled by a depreciated currency—throttled with a blockade that deprived us of nearly all means of getting material or workmen, unable to use slave labor, with which we were abundantly supplied, except in the most unskilled department of production; hampered by want of transportation, even of the commonest supplies of food; with no stock on hand even of articles such as steel, copper, leather, or iron, which we must have to build up our establishments—against all these obstacles, in spite of all these deficiencies, we persevered at home as determinedly as did our troops in the field against a more tangible opposition, and in that short period created almost literally out of the ground foundries and rolling mills at Selma, Richmond, Atlanta, and Macon; smelting works at Petersburg; chemical works at Charlotte, N. C.; a powder mill far superior to any in the United States and unsurpassed by any across the ocean, and a chain of arsenals, armories, and laboratories equal in their capacity and improvements to the best of those in the United States, stretching link by link from Virginia to Alabama.

The inheritance from and the example set by such a father must have contributed largely to the development of the character and the forming of the life of our late friend and colleague.

In 1865 young MALLORY matriculated in Georgetown College, was graduated, and for some time filled the chair of classical languages. While teaching school in New Orleans in 1870 he read law and was admitted to practice by the supreme court. In 1876 he was elected to the Florida legislature. In 1880 he was elected to the Lower House of Congress and reelected two years later. He was elected United States Senator in 1897 and reelected in 1902 for the term expiring March, 1909.

He died in December last at the age of 59 years, leaving a splendid record and an untarnished name. He literally died with his harness on, resisting to the last the fatal disease that had been preying on his constitution for years. He delivered a speech to the Knights of Columbus the Sunday night before he was taken very ill.

A few hours before he was stricken he compiled an article for the Christmas edition of one of his State papers.

His was the simple life in many respects. In evidence of this his last request was that no Congressional delegation be appointed to attend his funeral and that the ceremonies be of the simplest character.

His taste was cultivated to a degree. In many years of association with him I never heard fall from his lips an unkind or hasty word. He suffered much. I have been in his room when he was racked with pain, but never heard a murmur or a word of complaint. He possessed patience for the small sorrows of life, as he had shown courage for the great disappointments that came to him and those he loved in his early youth.

He appeared to me as a link between the old time and the new when together we discussed the issues of 1865 and the characters of the men who figured in the civil and military life of that stormy time. He knew many of the leading men and officers. He had judged them from the view point of youth, and these impressions wore off with his student life. He knew only what he had gathered from history of the trials and hardships and sufferings of the rank and file of the Confederate army. History has not yet told and will never fully portray the heroic sacrifices and unquenchable spirit of the men and officers of the Southern army.

In addition to the simple life and patience that marked the character of our deceased colleague I was often struck with the correctness of his judgment and his strong sense of justice. He was fair to his opponents in debate, and rarely, if ever, did he lose his equanimity of temper.

He was a safe counselor. He was sincere and frank always. It might be said of him "That he was a man that would swear to his own hurt and change not." If he possessed some of the weaknesses that attach to our frail natures, I did not observe them.

Inheritance, association, and education combined to make of Senator MALLORY a model character. That these together fitted him in an eminent degree for the responsible duties of a legislator the public records of Congress, running through more than a decade, will amply show.

That he was warm-hearted and affectionate was clearly shown by the manner in which he often spoke of his family and kindred.

I often thought that his simple and somewhat exclusive life was possibly the result of self-imposed sacrifices for the good of others. This world has many such lives. The period in which our colleague lived and was reared and educated produced such characters. Sacrifice was the lot of all. It was necessary. Besides, it was contagious. It was in the air and filled the hearts and molded the lives of men and women.

The youths who drank in this spirit every day and watched it make heroes of beardless youths and angels of mercy of women raised in the lap of luxury, could but drink at the fountain of waters of sacrifice that flowed in bleeding wounds around the beleagured city, and spent its force in the hospitals where diseased and mutilated humanity appealed for aid and sympathy.

The records of Congress in both Houses will hand down to future generations the public life and services of our colleague. Had he been blessed with robust health there is no calculating the greater extent of his achievements. Had his party been in the majority he would undoubtedly have been one of its ablest leaders.

Those who knew him best will long regret his untimely end, particularly the men in both Houses nearing the "three score and ten," who look upon a member of 59 as yet young and active.

Another trait of character stood out prominently in Senator MALLORY's life. It was the virtue of gentleness, the crowning grace of great and good men.

He possessed this in an eminent degree. It helped no doubt to endear him to a loyal and devoted constituency. It bound him as with hooks of steel to those who knew him best and loved him most. It will keep green his memory in their minds and hearts when the scenes in which he figured shall have faded and the public acts in which he participated become, as it were, ancient history.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, while I had known of Senator MALLORY and of his distinguished life and services for many years, my personal acquaintance only started from the year 1906, when I first came to Congress. His whole life, as has been stated here perhaps many times, was practically spent in the service of the public, commencing with service as a soldier at the age of 15. There are few men who have passed through personally so much of the history of this country as did Senator MALLORY and yet have died comparatively young. He was not, from all that I have read or heard or have known of him, a man of exceptional brilliancy in any way. He was a simple, plain, unostentatious American citizen who was devoted to whatever duty came before him. When I first met him I was particularly impressed with this characteristic—a man of such distinguished services in almost all branches of the public service and yet as unassuming and modest as a schoolboy. He seemed to be an example of the kind of modest, hard, simple, plain work upon which the very life of our great Republic was founded. It is such men as Senator MALLORY that carry on the work of this country and of the world. They ask for no reward except the knowledge that their work has been well done. If anything can justify or does well justify such ceremonies as these, it is the calling to our minds and to the minds of those who come after us that such attention to duties, without the desire or the seeking for applause, the attending to whatever comes before us at the moment, is the one thing that is worth while in this life. It is the one thing upon which the stability of human affairs depend.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it may not be generally known that, although Florida was admitted into the Union of States on the 3d day of May, 1845, this is the first time since she became a member of the Federal Union that a Senator from Florida or a Representative from that State has died during his tenure of office. The first to die while engaged in active service was Senator STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY, only to be followed in a few weeks by his successor, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN. For nearly sixty-three years of Florida's history as an American State the hand of death was never laid upon a single one of her representatives here in either House. It seems a strange dispensation of Providence, and one that I shall not undertake to fathom, that almost within the month after Senator MALLORY had finished his labors here and gone across the river the young Senator appointed to succeed him should also be called from his labors here.

I was asked, Mr. Speaker, a few days ago by a gentleman, what was the distinguishing characteristic of Senator MALLORY? I answered without hesitation, and I think that would be the answer given by all the people of Florida, that his most distinguished characteristic was his sterling, rugged, uncompromising honesty under any and all circumstances. As has been said by gentlemen who have paid tribute to him to-day, he did not rank in that class of American statesmen known for their great brilliancy, known for their gifts of magnificent oratory, but he was painstaking, he was careful, he was loyal, he was true, and he was honest.

No step in his life, whether as private citizen, whether as a practitioner at the bar, whether as a member of the Florida legislature, a Member of this House, or a member of the Senate, was ever taken except with the purest of motives and the most patriotic of purposes. I knew Mr. MALLORY personally for nearly a quarter of a century. I have gone with him over the State of Florida in political campaigns. I have known him well during all that time and, although we have had in the State of Florida at times fierce factional differences, the opponents of Senator MALLORY always knew that he would never stoop to anything that was improper or unfair to achieve an advantage. The people of the State of Florida, I think, loved Mr. MALLORY probably with an intenser affection than any other of her sons. People who bitterly opposed him in the field of politics admired, honored, and respected him. I think I can say, too, Mr. Speaker, for him something that is exceedingly rare in American politics. Having been a Member of this House for two terms, as has already been mentioned, he was a candidate for a third term, and having been defeated by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. SPARKMAN], he retired to his home at Pensacola and assumed his position as a quiet citizen, taking up his work as a lawyer and lending every possible aid in the upbuilding of the city and State he loved so well.

In 1897 there was a fierce Senatorial conflict before the legislature of Florida. Mr. MALLORY was not a candidate. The contest was between others. After this contest had dragged its weary and bitter lengths for some weeks and it seemed impossible that either of the contestants could be elected, some gentlemen who were not supporters of either of the two prominent candidates got together and it was suggested that they send for Mr. MALLORY.

They telegraphed for him, and he came to Tallahassee. I remember how he looked when he arrived. The dread disease which eventually carried him off was then upon him. Pale and emaciated, he was hardly recognizable by the friends who had known him in the years before.

He had a conference that night with the gentleman who had sent for him, and the next day, without the expenditure of a dollar, without a promise of any character, he was elected to the United States Senate. In 1904, without the expenditure of a cent, he was unanimously renominated, and in 1905, without an opponent, and without the expenditure of a dollar, he was unanimously re-elected as a Senator.

I believe it is generally conceded among the people of the State of Florida that if his health had improved he would have been returned for the third time to the Senate, with practically no opposition.

Mr. MALLORY's life will always be an inspiration to the youth of Florida. It ought to be an inspiration to the youth of this whole country. What he was he had carved out for himself, because, as has been so well stated, he was left in his early youth to strike out for himself, without money and without aid.

He has never been "found wanting" in any position of honor or trust to which his fellow-citizens have called him. Modest, unassuming, and generous, he was a model citizen; honest, sincere, and patriotic, he was a faithful public servant; candid, kind, and unselfish, he was a genuine friend. He despised hypocrisy. He would spurn success secured at the sacrifice of honor. He never compromised with wrong or winked at fraud. The Senate may have had abler members, but no man who ever sat in that august body was more thoroughly consecrated to the cause of right than was our dead Senator—STEPHEN RUSSELL MALLORY.

THE LATE SENATOR BRYAN.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in accordance with the order of the day an opportunity be now given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, late a United States Senator from the State of Florida.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the few remarks that I have just submitted to the House with reference to the late Senator MALLORY, no death had occurred in the Florida delegation from the time of her admission to the Union until the death of Senator MALLORY.

We now turn to pay tribute to the memory of his successor, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN. He was born near Fort Mason, then in Orange, now in Lake County, Fla., on the 10th day of October, 1876. In 1883 his father, Hon. John Milton Bryan, moved with his family to a place about 3½ miles south of Kissimmee, in what was then Orange, but now Osceola County, where young BRYAN grew to manhood. He worked on the farm, and aided his father in looking after his cattle. During the time when his services were not needed in looking after his father's herds or in performing labor upon the farm, young BRYAN attended the common schools of the country, until he had reached a point where it was necessary for him to attend a high school. He then attended the high school in Kissimmee, driving back and forth, morning and evening, in company with his brother, Nathan P. Bryan, his other brother, John Bryan, and the rest of his father's children. In September, 1892, he entered the freshman class at Emory College, at Oxford, Ga., from which he graduated fifth in a class of about forty, with the degree of A. B., in June, 1896.

In the summer of 1896, he was chosen as principal of the public school at Monticello, Ga., and taught there for one year. On account of the ill health of his mother, to whom he was devotedly attached, he remained at home during the fall and winter of 1897. He went to Jacksonville in the spring of 1898, and was engaged in the law office of Barrs & Bryan, composed of Hon. John M. Barrs, of the city of Jacksonville, and his brother, Nathan P. Bryan, and for several months he read in the office of these gentlemen.

In September, 1898, he entered the law department of Washington and Lee University, and graduated therefrom in June, 1899, with the degree of LL. B., making the two years' course in one year.

In the summer of 1899 he traveled over Florida, securing students for the law department of Washington and Lee University. Mr. Speaker, this gave the young man a State-wide acquaintance, and enabled him to make friends in different sections of Florida, which stood him well in hand after he had entered the arena of politics.

I knew the young man when he first came to Jacksonville to live. I was a citizen of Jacksonville at the time, and his brother, Hon. Nathan P. Bryan, lived very near me, and we were neighbors. Young BRYAN visited my house often, and I became thoroughly well acquainted with him. Tall, slender, and handsome, he would have attracted attention in any assemblage. I never knew a young man who began life with brighter prospects than did he. Often I have discussed with him his future, and have taken it upon myself to advise him, to some extent. He was related to a great many people scattered throughout the State of Florida. The Bryans are a numerous family, and hardly a section of the State, hardly a county, I might say, in which there does not live some relative of his. He was distinctly marked for the field of politics. Bright, optimistic, hopeful, cheerful, he made friends wherever he went. The law and politics invited him. And if he had lived the allotted time there is no question but that his name would have been written high upon the scroll of fame. On his twenty-second birthday, October 10, 1899, he became a member of the law firm of Barrs & Bryan, at Jacksonville, and then began the active work of his life. He remained with this firm for about one year and three months, when he voluntarily, on January 1, 1901, severed his connection with it and opened an office for himself, adjoining that of the Hon. Duncan U. Fletcher, one of the leading lawyers of Jacksonville, who took a great interest in the future of the young man.

He remained by himself in the practice of the law in the city of Jacksonville until January 1, 1903, when his brother Nathan and himself formed a law partnership under the firm name of Bryan & Bryan, which was dissolved only by the death of WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN March 22, 1908. I should have said that he was admitted to the bar at Kissimmee, the county seat of his home county of Osceola, in October, 1899.

His first appearance before the people of Florida in any kind of contest was in the year 1900, when an effort was made to remove the State capital from Tallahassee to the city of Jacksonville. Young BRYAN was a citizen of Jacksonville. I had the honor to occupy somewhat of a leading position in the fight for Jacksonville, and I availed myself of his services as a speaker in a good many sections of the State of Florida. Wherever he went he upheld the cause of his home city, with convincing logic and with an eloquence which charmed his audience, and when the votes came in the results of his work were apparent.

His practice at the bar, so far as he was personally concerned, had to do mainly with the criminal side of the court. The firm of Bryan & Bryan did a large and lucrative business, covering the civil side as well as the criminal side of the law, but the young Senator seemed to take more naturally to that side of the law, and he appeared and was usually successful in important criminal cases in various parts of the State. In 1902 he was elected county solicitor of the county of Duval, in which the city of Jacksonville is located, and in a total vote of 3,100 his majority was 1,100 votes. During his incumbency of the office of county solicitor he made a fight against what was denominated in the city of Jacksonville the "ice trust," which gave him a great deal of prominence. His brother stated to me—I was not familiar with the litigation—that there were six ice factories in the city of Jacksonville. A combination existed between them, by the terms of which one only was in operation, while the other five were held ready to be put in operation at any time if necessary to crush competition.

I believe it is generally conceded that his prosecution in this case broke up what was known as the "ice trust" and was a positive benefit not only to the people of the city of Jacksonville, but to the people of the entire State.

On September 9, 1903, he was united in marriage at Lexington, Va., to Miss Janet George Allan. Mr. BRYAN belonged to the Knights of Pythias, was a member of the Seminole Club in Jacksonville, the most exclusive organization of its kind there, was a member of the Board of Trade of the city of Jacksonville, was a member of the Jacksonville Bar Association and of the Florida State Bar Association.

He was appointed Senator in the 25th of December, 1907. He took the oath of office in the Senate Chamber on January 9, 1908, and February 18, 1908, was his last day in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that Mr. BRYAN was the youngest man who ever sat in the Senate Chamber save two. I want to say that if Mr. BRYAN had remained in the Senate Chamber, young as he was, the country would have heard from him, and Florida would not have been ashamed of his record there. On Christmas Day, 1907, full of life, of hope, full of ambition, with a young wife who was justly proud of him and solicitous for his future career, he was handed a Christmas present that able and deserving men have spent a lifetime to secure. The governor of Florida was his friend. He had materially aided in making him the governor of Florida, but, Mr. Speaker, the people of Florida recognized at the time that the governor of Florida did not merely pay a political debt, but that he honored the State when he handed this young native of her soil his commission as one of Florida's ambassadors in the highest legislative body in all the world.

When the electric wires flashed the sad news across our beloved Commonwealth that the lamented MALLORY had "finished the course;" that the remnant of that magnificent army which followed the standard of the immortal Lee had again been reduced by the death of as manly a man as ever bore allegiance to the "stars and bars," those of us who were acquainted with conditions in Florida had no difficulty in determining where the governor would look for one to occupy Florida's "vacant chair" at the other end of the Capitol. We knew that the governor would call WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN to this high place.

In 1904 there took place in Florida, inside the Democratic party, a fierce contest for the nomination for governor. Napoleon B. Broward, the present governor, was declared to be the nominee. In his contest before the people in a primary election for the gubernatorial nomination, Governor Broward had no more active supporter than WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN.

The young lawyer and orator threw himself into the fight and waged a ceaseless war in the interest of his friend. I was not a supporter of Governor Broward, and consequently knew nothing as to the management of his campaign, but those who were in a position to know claim that the organization and conduct of Broward's successful campaign for the governorship was the product of the brain and genius of WILL BRYAN. I may say that Broward's success was considered marvelous, because his opponent was then, as he is now, the most popular and best beloved citizen of our State.

This being the condition of affairs, none were surprised when the Associated Press announced that the name of the new Senator from Florida was WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, when I reflect upon the career of WILL BRYAN I catch myself asking the question, "Is it worth the effort?" Here was a young man in the rosy morning of life; blessed by the Creator with mental gifts of a superior nature; tall, athletic, and handsome; loved, yea, the very idol of his devoted young wife, his aged father and mother, his brothers and sisters, and thousands of staunch, devoted friends all over the broad expanse of his native State.

He stood last Christmas morning, surrounded by his loved ones, on the very pinnacle of fame and saw stretching out before him a long life of distinguished service to his State and country. How justly proud the father and mother must have felt when in imagination as they sat in their humble Florida home they saw WILL, their WILL, a Florida country boy, on the 9th day of January, 1908, walk down the main aisle of the historic American Senate Chamber, with the eyes of the nation upon him, to take the oath of office as an American Senator and then to take his seat where Clay, Calhoun, and Webster had occupied seats! Surely their cup of happiness was full! He was just beyond the legal age, and I can hardly realize that he is dead. Just two months and thirteen days from the time when he took the oath as a Senator, with his hand clasped in that of his devoted wife and almost under the shadow of the Dome of the Capitol, the spirit of WILL BRYAN—Florida's young Senator—took its flight to "that bourne from which no traveler returns." To our human understandings this dispensation of Providence is inexplicable, but we can safely trust all things to Him who "doeth all things well."

I will close these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting from the last lines of a letter which his brother wrote me. He belonged to a large family, and he was the idol of that family. His brother, Nathan P.—strong, intellectual, recognized as one of the best lawyers in our State—in writing to me about him, used this language:

> Life has not been the same with me since. The State has lost a public servant. Others have lost a personal friend. It seems to those of us who were of his family that we have lost everything.

May God bless, comfort, and sustain this noble brother, and, as "He tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," may He be very near to the aged father and mother and the disconsolate young wife in this hour of sore trial and deepest gloom.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, when the news was conveyed to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixtieth Congress that the young Senator from Florida, W. J. BRYAN, was dead, having finally succumbed to that dread disease, typhoid fever, a thrill of deepest regret and sympathy was felt in Congress.

While I did not know Senator BRYAN intimately, and his public life in Washington was too short to form the best judgment as to his characteristics, I was most favorably impressed by him in the short association I had with him here.

Senator BRYAN had barely passed the age limit fixed by the Constitution of the United States when he was appointed Senator from the State of Florida, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the lamented Senator MALLORY.

Our distinguished friend and colleague, Hon. FRANK CLARK, introduced me to Senator BRYAN, and in our few brief interviews I formed a most pleasant impression of him. His death, so sad and sudden, terminating a career already brilliant, and which gave promise of greater and further usefulness to his State and country, is another proof that death does indeed love a shining mark.

Senator BRYAN was born in Lake County, in the State of Florida, October 10, 1876, and graduated with distinction at Emory College, in Oxford, Ga., with the degree of A. B., in June, 1896. In 1898 he entered the law department of the Washington-Lee University, and was graduated in June, 1899, with the degree of LL. B., taking the two years' course in one year. He began the practice of law in October, 1899. His career at the bar was very successful, especially in criminal and corporation cases.

In 1902 he was elected county solicitor, and was renominated to that office in 1906 without opposition, and was holding that office when he was appointed Senator of the United States on Christmas day, 1907. As county solicitor he did not hesitate to discharge his duty fearlessly. He was especially prominent in the prosecution of what is known as the "ice trust," the combination of ice factories in the State of Florida, the effect of which combination was felt outside of Jacksonville and in the State of Florida. He continued the prosecution of the ice trust until the combination was finally destroyed. As county solicitor he also did his duty in the prosecution of those who violated the laws against the sale of liquor upon Sunday and against gambling.

In his whole political career he manifested an intense devotion to his duty and absolute fearlessness, regardless of the rank and prominence of those who were charged with violation of the law.

The one office he held besides that of United States Senator was county solicitor, but in his brief career he was prominent in politics, having been elected a delegate to the St. Louis Democratic convention, heading the ticket by about 1,000 votes. Prominent in all the affairs of Florida officially, socially, and politically, his untimely end is a source of deepest regret not only to his intimate friends and associates and those of us who knew him in Congress, but to the entire State of Florida. To few men have been accorded with such unanimity of sentiment the love and friendship of those who knew him, the affection of the people, and the highest offices within the gift of the State. He was a brilliant lawyer, fearless public official, and a distinguished Senator of the United States. He was also a true friend, devoted husband and father, and a Christian gentleman. May his ashes rest in peace in the State of Florida, "the land of flowers," he loved so well. That Commonwealth has lost a most valuable public servant, whose early career gave promise of still greater usefulness and distinction.

In the language of his predecessor, Senator MALLORY, in speaking of another—

> Conscious of unfailing adherence to rectitude of purpose that had guided him through life, and secure in the possession of the respect and love of the people to whose service that life had been devoted, he heard without fear the decree that all must bow to, and passed from the sight of men forever.

We feel assured from his private life and public career that this man, so true and lovable, has passed into a brighter and happier existence in the great beyond.

In the words of Blaine's splendid eulogy on Garfield—

> In the silence of the receding world he heard the great waves breaking on a farther shore, and felt upon his wasted brow the breath of the eternal morning.

[Mr. WILSON of Illinois addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, to-day Georgia mourns with Florida at the bier of the late brilliant junior Senator from the latter State, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN. While the peculiarly sad and untimely taking off of this brilliant young Senator touched the sympathy and stirred the heartstrings of the entire nation, Georgia feels more than her general and ordinary share in that sorrow, for she had more than the ordinary and general interest in the brilliant young Senator whose promising career has been so suddenly, so sadly, and so prematurely ended.

Senator BRYAN was, in a sense, a son of Georgia, for while not a native of her soil, he was her mental and intellectual son, having received his education at one of Georgia's three great colleges—Emory College, at Oxford, Ga. Senator BRYAN graduated from that splendid college in June, 1896, at the age of 19, standing fifth in a class of about forty, having won both in his junior and senior years the honor of representing the literary society to which he belonged in the annual champion debate, one of the highest literary and oratorical honors of the college.

His career at Emory was brilliant and successful in every respect and gave prophetic promise of the higher honors that awaited him in the broader field of life's duties and responsibilities. As a student at Emory he was popular with his fellows and esteemed and respected by all. To-day there are hundreds of Emory boys scattered through Georgia who knew and loved "WILL" BRYAN at college, and who sincerely and earnestly mourn his untimely death upon the very threshold of a brilliant and successful career—a career of which they were universally proud.

After graduating at Emory Mr. BRYAN studied law at Washington and Lee University, in Virginia, and returned to his native and dearly beloved State of Florida, engaging in the practice of his profession at Jacksonville. His professional career was in every way creditable, and he won early and high success at the bar.

To a man of his affable manners and genial and sunny disposition personal popularity came naturally; and, when to personal popularity is added mental ability of a high order and moral courage of the most pronounced type, as was the case with Senator BRYAN, his early and splendid success in politics is not surprising. He had been the devoted friend of Governor Broward, and his loyal and devoted political champion as well, so that when the death of the late lamented Senator MALLORY made it the duty of the governor to appoint a successor to that Senator, it surprised no one in Florida that, in spite of his youth, the choice easily fell on young BRYAN. Indeed, the action of the governor was not only expected in Florida, but warmly and generally indorsed by the people of that State. I recall that, when his appointment was announced, Bishop Warren Candler, of Georgia, who had been the distinguished and able president of Emory College when young BRYAN was a student there, and who is one of the most brilliant and able sons of the South, indorsed the appointment in a glowing eulogy to his former pupil and in a splendid tribute to the mental and moral worth of the young gentleman who had been so highly, so signally honored.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate is one of the high goals of political ambition. Few men achieve election to that distinguished body before middle age has come upon them; the vast majority of the men who are elected to it are comparatively old men when they are elected. The selection of this young man, not 32 years old at the time of his appointment, was not only a signal tribute to his worth, but was a shining inspiration to the young men of America.

Great things were expected of him, and he stood upon the threshold of a brilliant public career. One of the very youngest men who ever sat in the American Senate and the youngest who had held a seat in that august body for many years, he was a brilliant, attractive, and commanding figure.

The ways of Providence are often inexplicable. Death is, at all times, a mysterious and awful specter. When she summons those who are old, full of years of achievements and of honors, her decrees seem hard enough, but when she selects for her shining mark a brilliant, clean, healthy, promising young man, standing in the very lime light of American public life, and with the future opening up before him like some beautiful book, her decrees pass all human understanding and seek their justification in the wisdom of the Infinite and Omniscient. Senator BRYAN'S death was one of the saddest events in our history, and all our people mourn with the State and the nation so prematurely bereaved, and with the family so sorely afflicted.

Mr. MOUSER. At the request of a close friend of mine serving on the Florida delegation in this House, I arise to pay a tribute of respect to one of these whose life and deeds we commemorate to-day.

It was not my high privilege to know Senator BRYAN, except as our citizens generally become acquainted with their public servants.

I have stood in reverence and awe of him who gained in the prime of youth and in the morning of his splendid manhood high national distinction and renown.

My heart was touched with profound sorrow at the news of his untimely death.

How thrilling and glorious to contemplate the life and successful career of this noted son of Florida, and yet how sad to believe that cruel death has stricken him down. Mystery of mysteries, that joyous, hopeful, promising life should yield and be conquered by the "King of Terrors!"

Why, we ask, was not another called, whose days were shadowed o'er by pain and suffering, whose existence was a misery? Why? Why should one so just, so young, so true, so noble, be called away?

We ponder o'er this perplexing problem. We are wont to criticise and condemn that inscrutable Providence which withers and decays joyous, budding youth, blights strong, virile, and successful young manhood, and yet passes by trembling, suffering age, patiently waiting and expecting the touch of death.

Senator BRYAN won renown and high political honor at an age when most men are struggling to lay the foundation of their careers. He was possessed of a keen and powerful mind, a genial, broad, and honest nature. Loving work, he gave his hours over to study and thorough investigation. Believing that life's honors are only bestowed upon the earnest, capable, and worthy, he cultivated the splendid natural talents which he inherited from strong and sturdy ancestors. From his friends I gather that he was ambitious, yet modest, strong and forceful, yet tender and loving.

Possessing a clear vision, and a peculiar talent for concise and facile statement, a remarkable comprehension of public questions, a keen perception, he would have undoubtedly gained an exalted place in the minds and hearts of his fellow Senators, and have won high national renown. Without forcing attention, he attracted his fellow-men. This explains, in a way, his high place in the hearts of the citizens of his State.

Oftentimes have I heard, while he was serving in his high place at the other end of the Capitol, that the young Senator from Florida had gained the respect and the esteem of his distinguished colleagues.

His short and promising career is romantic, intensely interesting, and full of noble lessons. We read in the light of his splendid reputation of the honors that he might have achieved had death but spared him for the public service.

To those who knew him well and enjoyed the pleasure of his close acquaintance, I leave the pleasing task of portraying the splendid qualities of mind and heart which raised him to the heights of fame.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN came to the Senate of the United States with the rose of youth upon him, and by one of those curious occurrences which we with our short sight into the future call coincidences, the seat assigned him was immediately adjoining that of the then oldest member of the Senate, Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, of Maryland. I took occasion a few days after his advent into the Senate to go there at a time that I thought both of those gentlemen would be there, in order to look upon the contrast; and I am glad now that I did. There sat the Senator from Maryland, trim, erect, precise, a gentleman of the old school, a man who had twice represented his State in the Senate of the United States before his young colleague was born; a man whose history was in the past, who was crowning a long and useful life with the distinguished honor of again representing his State in that great body; by his side his young colleague, just over the legal age, youthful, buoyant, himself alert, a typical American of the best class. For all that the eye could see his history lay in the future, and yet the history of both lay in the past, for both have met the common fate.

I know of nothing more illustrative of the democracy of our country, of the great common democracy, than the quartette of Senators who sat side by side at that time in the Senate Chamber. As has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], a seat in the Senate of the United States is a great goal. Many strive for it, few attain it; but those men who sat there at that time illustrate that it is denied to none, not to the old, not to the young; not to the crippled, for one of the quartette was blind; not to those born of others than the Anglo-Saxon race, for one of those was of Indian parentage. Opportunity in this land is as broad to-day as it ever was. We sometimes, in public speech or in private meditation, wonder whether our institutions are in any sense decaying. I think not. Such sights as those, illustrating that the door of opportunity still swings to the touch, leads to hope and to belief that for the American of to-day the opportunities in public life are as free and as open as they have ever been in the history of our country.

I like to reflect upon the life of this young Senator, because it was so typically American. I gather, without having made much inquiry on the subject, that there was not much wealth in the family from which he came. I gather that he was one of a large family, and, as is not uncommon in large families, the one in whom the affections and the ambitions of that family centered. How wonderfully and how nobly he justified their affections and realized their ambitions!

I had the good fortune to be a visitor to Florida during his all too brief term in the Senate. I spoke to many of the young Senator and of the fact of his youth, and not in one single instance did I hear an adverse criticism of WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN. There seemed, on the other hand, a pride that their State could produce a man who at that early age would be believed by so many and by the governor of his State to be worthy of the high office to which he had been appointed. It is to the credit of our American institutions, I think, and to our policy of party government that Senator BRYAN came to his appointment here through the path which so many have trod, and that is of party service, and through another path and for another reason which I hope will never fail in American politics and American public life, and that is the gratitude of a friend befriended. The governor of that State had won his high office after a hard contest. This young man had been the manager of that campaign. He had organized it from one end of that great State to the other. It was a difficult task, as the competitors were many and strong, particularly difficult for so young a man; and yet the campaign had been successful.

I honor the governor who after election remembered those who had been his friends before. The preacher of the past in Ecclesiastes said:

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth—

But in the same verse he put the grim warning—

But know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

I gather that there is very little for WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN to have remembered against him in the judgment day. His life seems to have been an open book, a typical American life on that side also, a life of which those who remain behind him may well be proud, a life in which that child who never saw him can rejoice in after days.

I do not see why we should mourn for the dead. I can mourn for the living, mourn for this brother who wrote that affecting letter, mourn for the family that to-day longs for—

The touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

But not for the dead, and particularly not for the young man in his prime. He has achieved much, but he has also escaped much. The years of which the preacher speaks, when the grasshopper shall be a burden, when there shall be no more pleasure in them, never shall be known to him. In his allotted sphere he has done much. Why should there be mourning for him, or for any other dead friend? He has achieved; he has fought the fight; he is gone beyond. Doubtless many times he looked out in that beautiful State, the land of sun and flowers, across one of their glorious sunsets, and admired its beauty as so many of us have, since and before, with no thought of any personal application; but to-day he has gone into the glory of that sunlight. The stars, the moon, and the planets are no mystery to him now, for he is a part of them, and the golden shaft, which in the morning gilds all, gleams as the Throne which he can approach. There is nothing in this life of his to be sad about, but everything to be glad about. We mourn with those who are here; but we rejoice for this young, strong, virile, typical American life, which can be such an example to those of us who are also young.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, there is much of consolation for the bereaved relatives and sorrowing friends of this young man in the thought so beautifully expressed by the poet and paraphrased by me—If to live in the hearts of those we leave behind is not to die, WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN is not dead.

Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that my acquaintance with WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN was of brief duration, still I can not refrain from adding my mite of tribute to his memory. I learned through the public press of his appointment as Senator; of his extreme youth; the fact that he would be the youngest man to occupy a seat in that great body since Henry Clay took the solemn oath of office. I rightly conjectured that he must have been the possessor of qualities of heart and mind out of the ordinary to justify his selection for so important and responsible a position.

And when later on I was introduced to the young Senator by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] I made a mental note of my impression—that the governor of Florida had not made a mistake. His career in the Senate was so brief that I was compelled to look into his public career in his home State to properly guage his stature, and I am pleased to at this time bear testimony to the fact that his administration of the one public office that he filled before he came to the United States Senate was universally indorsed by the community in which he lived.

Born in a log cabin, on a farm in Lake County, Fla., he lived the free and open life of a country lad, helping at the chores, attending school; his life was no different than the lives of thousands of other young boys similarly situated. He attended the country schools and laid the foundation of his education in that great university of the common people. Later on, he entered Emory College, at Oxford, Ga., and graduated from that institution high up in his class. Shortly thereafter he taught school, and then took a law course at Washington and Lee University, graduating with the degree of LL. B. after one year. Thereafter he practiced law successfully. In 1902 he was elected to the important office of county solicitor of Duval County, which office gave him the first opportunity he had of exercising his talent as an administrative officer. That his heart was in the right place is best evidenced by the fact that he began a vigorous prosecution of the ice trust that was oppressing the people of his county, and his prosecution was in the end successful. He was reelected county solicitor in 1906 by an increased majority, plainly demonstrating that his course met the approval of the electors of his county.

He was happily married, and as he had been a dutiful and obedient son, so he was a faithful and loving husband to the accomplished wife who shared in his first triumphs, and who so bravely bore the sharp pangs of grief, a grief that is to know no end, although it will be softened by that greatest of healers—time.

A member of the Episcopal Church, obedient to the laws of God and man, he was an exemplary Christian gentleman, modest, unassuming, capable of doing well all little things that it was his duty to do, he thus had the best training to care for larger things when fate looking his way espied the ideal Senator.

It is hard indeed for those who loved this young man to accept this seemingly harsh and cruel decree as coming from an all-wise, all-kind, all-loving Father. But such is the end of man. And failing in my search for comforting thoughts for his relatives and friends, I quote from the poem of Fitz-Greene Halleck:

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune to know Senator WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN as intimately as others here knew him. I knew him intimately enough, however, to count him as my friend, and in his death I am sure I lost a friend.

My acquaintance and friendship with him date back but a few years. I first knew him in Jacksonville, Fla., where I went to discuss a legal proposition in a case with him. I had heard and read much about him, but had never met him until then. His genial disposition at once drew me to him. His ability as a lawyer at once was plainly evident to me.

Our acquaintance ripened into a friendship which I prized very highly, and his death was a sad loss to me. Death is always sad, but in this case it is doubly sad. Senator WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN had a short, but remarkable, career. Step by step, in rapid strides, he had climbed to the exalted position of United States Senator. He had just begun his duties in that distinguished body when the withering hand of death laid hold of him and claimed him for its own.

In every position to which he had been chosen by his people he had served with distinction and honor. In him the people of his section and of his State knew they had a true and noble character, and they were glad to honor him with their confidence by placing him in offices of honor and trust. In honoring him they honored themselves.

He was true to his people and true to every trust. He had demonstrated that he was worthy of their confidence and esteem and had been in every way faithful to the people who had honored him. He had not had time to make a record in the Senate, but it is safe to assume that he would have proven as worthy and as well fitted there as he did in other positions with which he was honored.

His was indeed a remarkable career—but little more than a boy, he was serving in the United States Senate. For one to receive these honors surely there is merit. In this case there was merit, for there was no man in the State of Florida, for his years, who stood higher in the estimation of the people as a lawyer and as a statesman than Senator WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN.

He was much beloved by the people of Florida, and, in fact, by all who knew him. He was one of those in whose presence you could not be without being convinced that "there stands a man."

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands,
Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

Such a noble man I think Senator BRYAN was. The world sustains a great loss when one like this is taken away from us.

That he was beloved by those who knew him best was evidenced by the great sorrow that spread over his home city of Jacksonville and over the whole State of Florida when the news of his death was flashed over the country on March 22, 1908.

It was evidenced again when thousands of his friends and acquaintances with sorrowing hearts gathered at the cemetery to see him laid to rest beneath his native soil and a bank of tenderest flowers.

What his future would have been it is not given to us to know, but one gifted with the winning qualities that he possessed would have surely walked from success to even higher achievements.

He was a noble young man, a strong Christian character, an able lawyer, a polished gentleman, and a statesman who had manfully fought his way by effort and perseverance to the great things he had achieved.

Although he was cut down in his early manhood, his life was nevertheless a complete success. He would have developed as years of experience were added to his life, and would no doubt have left his name among those of the nation's truly great. But the Great Master knew best, and he was called away from this scene of activities into the great beyond, where God-fearing and God-serving souls are taken into that sweet and perpetual rest, where there is no strife, but where love and happiness reign supreme.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, of all the symbolism in which affection enshrines the memory of the dead, the broken shaft is the most pathetic. When a sheaf of grain is pictured upon the monumental marble, it testifies that the golden grain of a lifetime has been garnered. When the violets and lilies are chiseled upon the tomb, they tell that the budding life has been transplanted to blossom under serener skies. But when the oak of the forest is snapped in twain it startles us, and to the pagan mind it seemed remorseless and inexplicable. But to us, nurtured in the atmosphere of Christendom, while there arises perplexity, yet in the background we discern the figure of consolation.

The good man is immortal until his work is done, and whether he departs at noontide, when the shadows begin to fall, or in the night season, we can only say: "He was not, for God took him."

It is indeed a tribute to our better nature to grieve when our friends depart from among the living. Our humanity could not be worth the having without this attribute. But as we stand by the grave of our friends we are comforted by the counsel of Holy Writ "not to sorrow for them that are asleep even as those who have no hope." My friends, we all have our natural ambitions to act well our parts among our fellows; and we are all emulous to "do the State some service," but there is no one of us whose best and supremest aspiration is not to leave, amongst our closest circle, the world a little darkened at our own departure. Senator BRYAN's brother wrote to a friend, a Member of this body:

> Life has not been the same with me since. The State has lost a public servant, others have lost a personal friend. It seems to those of us who were of his family that we have lost everything.

May this testimony, in some measure at least, be recorded of us when our time shall come!

Senator WILLIAM J. BRYAN's career reads like a legend of romance. In the highest sense he was one of nature's noblemen. He was born in Orange (now Lake) County, Fla., near Fort Mason, October 10, 1876. His eyes opened upon life within a log cabin. When he was 7 years of age his "father moved from Fort Mason to the old home, 3½ miles south of Kissimmee, then in Orange, now in Osceola, County, Fla., where the boy was reared and lived until he went to Jacksonville to practice law" (in 1899).

With an elementary training in the public schools, he entered the freshman class at Emory College, Oxford, Ga., just before attaining his sixteenth year. From this honored institution he graduated four years later, fifth in a class of about forty, with the degree of A. B.

From time out of mind this ancient college has maintained two debating societies, which own their separate buildings and between which has always existed the keenest and liveliest rivalry. At each commencement one night is devoted to a champion debate between these literary societies.

Whilst the custom was to select the competitors from among the senior class, young BRYAN was accorded this honor at both his junior and his senior terms. He was a manly, athletic fellow, participating with keen zest in baseball, football, and tennis. Upon his graduation he was elected principal of the public school at Monticello, Ga., where he taught a year. The ensuing fall, his mother's health being poor, he stayed at home until about April, 1898, when he went to Jacksonville, and for a few months was a student of law in the office of Barrs & Bryan. In September of that year he entered the law department of Washington and Lee University, an institution whose standards are advanced and progressive as any sister university in the land and whose curriculum is always abreast of the highest, receiving the degree of LL. B. in June, 1899. Here he was awarded an intersociety medal for oratory and represented Washington and Lee University in the Southern Intercollegiate Oratorical Association. During the same year, upon his twenty-second birthday, he became a partner of the law firm of Barrs & Bryan, with whom he remained until January 1, at which time he "started out for himself," practicing thus for two years, when he formed a partnership with his brother, which was only dissolved by the Senator's death.

His forte and predilection in law were in the direction of criminal practice, in which he attained both fame and success.

On July 15, 1902, he was nominated by 1,100 majority out of a total of 3,100 votes for county solicitor; renominated without opposition in 1906, and was holding this office when appointed to the United States Senate, upon Christmas Day, 1907.

As county solicitor he forced the closing of saloons on Sunday and the closing of gambling houses, by prosecution, during the first term of court after he was sworn in.

A brief outline of his prosecution of the ice trust, in 1906, will prove interesting as well as characteristic.

There were, in Jacksonville, six ice factories, but by agreement only one was operated, the combine dividing the profits. The other five factories were held equipped and prepared to crush out opposition. The effects of this trust were felt outside of Jacksonville. Letters were introduced in evidence showing a threat to the parties putting up an ice plant at Starke. The defendants were acquitted, at the first trial, and continued the combine for about one week, when they were again prosecuted until they were convicted upon the proposition that each overt act under an old conspiracy constituted a new conspiracy. The proceedings were under the common law.

The county solicitorship was the only office he ever held before being appointed Senator.

He was married September 9, 1903, at Lexington, Va., to Miss Janet Allan, a member of a distinguished Virginia family. On Easter Sunday, 1905, he united with the Episcopal Church. He was sworn as Senator January 9 of the present year, and his last appearance in that Chamber was on February 18, two days after typhoid fever had without his knowledge come upon him, a not uncommon feature of that insidious disease. He died March 22, 1908, aged 31 years and 5 months.

During his brief Senatorial career he was placed upon nearly all the committees to which assignments his predecessor had attained by long and distinguished service, a very unusual honor.

In his intercourse with his colleagues and his work on committees and upon the few occasions on which he addressed the Senate, he impressed that distinguished body in a way and to a degree which augured most auspiciously for a signal and fruitful career.

Such, in meager outline, was the career of Senator WILLIAM J. BRYAN. Were it not well, my friends, to linger a moment over the lesson it conveys? It was, indeed, a high and fine career of service to mankind than which there is nothing higher beneath the circuit of the sun. Such aims and ends constitute the only real royalty, for—

> Herein stands the office of a king,
> His honor, virtue, merit, and chief praise,
> That for the public all this weight he bears;
> Yet he who reigns within himself, and rules
> Passion, desires, and fears, is more than king.

It is of such men that the greatest of the ancient philosophers affirmed:

> The man of great soul is one who counts himself worthy of great things, being worthy.

How far removed from this noble aphorism is the wretched plaint of Solomon:

> Surely man at his best estate is only vanity.

Man at his best estate is thrilled with intimations of immortality. Death to a man like Senator BRYAN is but a shadow cast by his transition to loftier activities.

> He is not dead but sleepeth; well we know
> The form that now lies mute beneath the sod
> Shall rise when time the golden bugles blow,
> And pour their music through the courts of God.

In his essay upon death Lord Bacon has pictured that of Senator BRYAN:

> He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good doth divert the troubles of death. Death hath this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth envy.

During the dreadful Sepoy mutiny in India, when the English garrison in Lucknow, with the women and children, was beleaguered by its ferocious and merciless foes and the fate of Cawnpore seemed staring them in the face, a cry was heard from the little Scotch lassie Jeannie Brown: "Dinna ye hear the pibroch! Dinna ye hear the slogan!" Her eager and alert ear had caught from afar the sound of the bagpipe in the approaching army of Sir Colin Campbell.

And so, my friends, while our hearts are attuned to sorrow that a life fraught with such high promise should be cut off from among us, our chastened reflection can discern echoes of counsel and encouragement from his life which should animate us all to a renewed and higher consecration to worthy and unselfish devotion to our country and our kind. And whilst among the perplexities of this world we "Can not always see the way," we can all become better and stronger from the example of such a life; and with pride and gratitude for such a career, can cry to our Father and his Father:

Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief,
And grant Thy servant such a life and death!

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, we are again reminded of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death. Scarcely have loving hands placed the last sod upon the grave of some friend taken by the hand of death from these halls than the soft chant of the funeral dirge is heard over the earthly remains of another following close after him. How strongly do these proceedings and the occasions for them render us mindful of this melancholy truth.

On the 23d of December last, when all Christian lands were preparing to commemorate that greatest of events in the history of the world, the sad message was flashed across the continent that Florida's senior Senator, STEPHEN R. MALLORY, was no more. Within less than ninety days the country was again shocked to learn that his successor, the young and brilliant BRYAN, had likewise been cut down at his post of duty by the fell destroyer, who spares neither age nor position.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to give in detail the life history of the deceased. Others here, this afternoon, have done that, and I shall only glance at some of the more prominent features of his career. His life, though short, was an eventful one. Less than 32 years of age when death laid its ruthless hand upon him, he had accomplished much, and had planted his banner high upon the mountain peaks of human achievement.

Reared upon a farm with modest surroundings, he nevertheless distinguished himself in every field of endeavor into which he entered. Attending during his early years the common schools in his native State, his eighteenth year found him at Emory College, one of the finest institutions of learning in the South, where he graduated with distinction four years later. Then entering Washington and Lee University and taking the two years' legal course in one, he again graduated with honors, having meanwhile achieved in the field of intercollegiate debate an enviable reputation as an orator and a debater. Entering the practice of law in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., his rise was rapid until he stood in the front ranks of his profession. The prosecuting attorney for the county of Duvall at the age of 26, he distinguished himself as an honest and fearless prosecutor. While holding this position, one of the most responsible in the State, he was appointed by the governor of Florida to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate caused by the death of the late S. R. MALLORY, and that, too, before he had passed his thirty-second year, a record of which the chief actor might have been justly proud, and one which reflects honor upon the entire State within which his life work was done.

Such a life is well worthy of study, and the means by which he accomplished so much during a career so brief are deserving of careful consideration. They were self-reliance and an intense earnestness, coupled with a commanding personality and a strong, vigorous intellect.

Taught self-confidence on the farm, that best of all schools for early training, he had implicit faith in his own powers, and placed little reliance upon adventitious aids. The guiding principle of his life is, perhaps, well expressed in the following beautiful lines:

Trust in thine own untried capacity
As thou wouldst trust in God Himself. Thy soul
Is but an emanation from the whole.
Thou dost not dream what forces lie in thee,
Vast and unfathomed as the greatest sea.
Thy silent mind o'er diamond caves may roll;
Go seek them—but let Pilot Will control
Those passions which thy favoring winds can be.
No man shall place a limit on thy strength;
Such triumphs as by mortals may be gained
May yet be thine if thou wilt but believe
In thy Creator and thyself. At length
Some feet will tread the loftiest heights attained;
Why not thine own? Press on, achieve; achieve!

With a simple faith in his Creator and a conviction that he might accomplish whatever he willed to do, he did press on until achievement grand and enduring crowned his efforts.

Choosing the law as a vocation, he reached the highest point in his profession, and going to work with that singleness of purpose and self-reliance which ever characterized him, his fame as a lawyer soon extended from one end of the State to the other. Determined to shine in the political field, he brought to bear the same characteristics and soon became a commanding figure in the domain of politics, taking a high stand in the councils of his party.

Another secret of his remarkable success was his thorough preparation for the great battle of life and its eventualities. He seems to have been well qualified for each emergency as it arose and prepared to take advantage of every opportunity in his struggle to rise until cut down by death. Each period in his life was well rounded, nothing left undone to insure success in the next field of endeavor. Entering the practice of law, he was well qualified for its most exacting demands. Suddenly elevated to the highest position in the gift of his State, he was found by study and thorough training in the field of his multitudinous labors to be prepared for his new and untried duties, as would have been abundantly shown had he been spared to complete his term of service.

These, Mr. Speaker, were the achievements of a life which ended while its morning was yet young and long before its sun had touched the zenith. What might we not have expected had his career run its allotted span of years? With talents such as we have seen, with a charm of manner at once commanding and pleasing, a degree of eloquence not often surpassed by any upon whom fortune has bestowed this rarest of gifts, we can well believe that had he been spared to us increase of years would have but added to his achievements and renown and his State still further enriched by his labors in her behalf.

But he has gone, and we can only judge of what he might have been by what he was; and, viewing him in the light of the past, his future was full of promise. There all was bright, with no cloud to cast a shadow over the pathway he was seemingly to tread. But his life though short in years was long in achievement, and while we miss his presence and mourn with his bereaved family his untimely end, we feel that he has not lived in vain and that his deeds, like pebbles dropped into the sea, will send out waves of ever-widening influence for good over the vast expanse of life's boundless ocean.

He may have had faults, as it is said no one is perfect, but I knew not of them, and if he possessed them they were like—

The prints which feet
Have left on Tampa's desert strand;
Soon as the rising tide shall beat
All trace will vanish from the sand.

while his virtues and his merits were stamped in marble and are as lasting as the coral reefs which lie along the southern shores of his native State.

Mr. Speaker, there is something inexpressibly sad in the death of one so young and whose life was so full of promise. Sorrowful are we even when the hand of death is laid upon the aged and the infirm, whose course is run, when some one with a well-spent life, tottering upon the brink, is swallowed up by the grave. And this, too, is a mystery which we may not now solve. But sadder still and deeper yet the mystery when one well equipped for the toil of the day, eager for the work before him, is removed from the scene of his labors ere the morning is spent and while the shadows still point toward the west. Still we console ourselves with the thought, as best we may, that the ways of Providence are often veiled in darkness and that it is not given to the finite mind to unravel the mysteries that hang about them. Then, too, we are a Christian people and indulge the hope that some time, somewhere, the riddle will be solved and we will understand.

Not now, but in the coming years
It may be in the better land,
We'll read the meaning of our tears
And then some time we'll understand.

We'll know why clouds instead of sun
Were over many a cherished plan,
Why song has ceased when scarce begun;
'Tis then some time we'll understand.

Why, what we long for most of all
Eludes so oft our eager hand;
Why hopes are crushed and castles fall,
Some time, somewhere, we'll understand.

This, indeed, is our expectation; we believe in a future life. We can not conceive that the brilliant intellect, the garnered wisdom even of our friend's short life was buried in the grave. All nature's teachings are to the contrary. The seasons that come and go, the lights and shadows that chase each other across the landscape, the trees and shrubs that cast their foliage when autumn comes, to be clad again with leaf and flower when spring returns, all teach us that there is no death, and that what we call such is but a transition stage to another life. Yes, this is our hope, and thus trusting, we leave him to rest near the waters of the beautiful river St. John, and close beside the city where so much of his life work was done.

Farewell departed friend, rest peacefully in thy Southern grave. Thy fame is secure and thy memory will ever be cherished in loving hearts.

Sleep until the shadows
Take their endless flight,
Until the morning break,
Good night! Good night:

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the signatures, as follows:

His Excellency the President and the honorable the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, on behalf of several hundred thousand American citizens born in Canada and in other parts of the British Empire, residing in New England, and far outnumbering all other citizens of foreign birth within this part of the United States, tender respectful and hearty thanks to His Excellency the President and to the honorable the Senate for the ratification of the arbitration treaty with Great Britain.

This action is to the signers an additional proof of the development of that cordial good feeling and that desire to promote the real interests of humanity which have of late years marked the relations between the two great countries which lead the world in the practical application of the principles of true democracy to the solution of national and international problems alike.

It is almost superfluous, therefore, to do more than allude to the statement lately made by some of our Irish-American fellow-citizens that the Government and people of the British Empire are unfriendly to this country. On the contrary, there exists among all Britons in every part of the world a warm and true friendship and admiration for the Government and the people of the United States, and this to an extent unmatched in any other nation. Abundant proof of this fact is furnished by the history of the relations between the United States and the British Empire within recent years, and the eager desire of Britons in every part of the world to welcome and salute the American fleet on its present historical cruise is sufficient to establish beyond the peradventure of a doubt the existence of this admirable state of feeling.

The signers of this memorial venture further to express the hope that His Excellency the President and the honorable the Senate will ratify the treaties now pending between this country on the one hand and the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland on the other, convinced as the signers are that such ratification would be for the best interests of the countries concerned, and will tend greatly to cement and perpetuate the existing relations of amity and commerce between the United States and all other English-speaking communities throughout the civilized world.

PELATIAH WEBSTER'S PLAN OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I present a memorial for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. The memorial is signed by the distinguished jurist, author, and statesman, Hon. Hannis Taylor, and relates to a historical document of great importance in connection with the constitutional history of this country. It embraces the researches of Mr. Taylor on this subject, and is unquestionably a contribution of rare interest and value. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, likewise, that it be printed in the RECORD and as a document.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator couple his request with a request for some additional copies. I have just been glancing at it, and it is a very important document. I would suggest that a thousand extra copies be printed. It would not cost much.

Mr. CARTER. I will amend the request by asking that 1,000 additional copies of the document be printed.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed. One thousand additional copies were ordered to be printed, and the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The purpose of this memorial is twofold: First, to place in the hands of Congress the data for a new and pivotal chapter in the history of the Constitution that will impress upon succeeding generations the all-important fact that every basic principle which differentiates our existing Federal system from all that have preceded it was a part of a single invention struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of one man; second, to press upon Congress the long-neglected duty of honoring, by an appropriate monument, the memory of an American statesman and patriot who has made a larger personal contribution to the science of government than any other one individual in the history of mankind. From the data thus presented it clearly appears that among our national builders Pelatiah Webster stands second to Washington alone. All the world understands in a vague and general way that certain path-breaking principles entered into the structure of our second Federal Constitution of 1789 which differentiate it from all other systems of Federal Government that have preceded it. M. de Tocqueville gave formal expression to that understanding when he said: "This Constitution, which may at first be confounded with Federal constitutions that have preceded it, rests in truth upon a wholly novel theory which may be considered a great discovery in modern political science. In the confederations that preceded the American Constitution of 1789, the allied States, for a common object, agreed to obey the injunctions of a Federal Government; but they reserved to themselves the right of ordaining and enforcing the execution of the laws of the Union. The American States, which combined in 1789, agreed that the Federal Government should not only dictate, but should execute its own enactments. In both cases the right is the same, but the exercise of the right is different; and this difference produced the most momentous consequences." (Democracy in America, vol. 1, pp. 198, 199.) Mr. Gladstone simply reiterated that idea when he said: "As the British constitution is the most subtile organism which has proceeded from progressive history, so the American Constitution is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." That master of the history of English institutions perfectly understood that as our State constitutions are mere reproductions, mere evolutions, from the English political system, so our second Federal Constitution is a new invention "struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

That invention of a new type of federal government, embodying, as Tocqueville said, "a wholly novel theory," is so unique that it can no more be confounded with any preceding federal government than a modern mogul engine can be confounded with an ancient stage coach. Did that wonderful invention, which has produced such momentous consequences, have a personal author, like all other inventions, or was it revealed at the same moment, and in some mysterious way, to a large number of persons, thinking and acting in isolation? Upon that humanly impossible or miraculous theory historians of our existing Constitution have attempted to explain the origin of the unique and prearranged plan of Federal Government presented to the Convention which sat at Philadelphia during the one hundred and twenty-five days that intervened between May 14 and September 17, 1787. After deducting recesses and holidays there could not have been more than ninety working days. No one has ever contended, or can ever contend, that the great invention in question was made after the Convention met, for the simple and conclusive reason that it was the basis of all the "plans" save one, carefully constructed beforehand, out of which the Constitution was evolved. Five and only five "plans," all prearranged, were submitted to the Convention, viz, the Virginia plan, the Charles Pinckney plan, the Connecticut plan, the Alexander Hamilton plan, and the New Jersey plan. As the last only proposed a revision of the Articles of Confederation, it may be dismissed from consideration. There were but four plans in which proposals for a new system of Federal Government were embodied, each resting upon the "wholly novel theory" which has produced "the most momentous consequences."

A distinguished specialist has well said that "the Virginia plan became the bedrock of the Constitution. (Meigs, The Growth of the Constitution in the Federal Convention of 1787, p. 17.) That plan, which embodied perfectly every phase of the great invention, was drafted by Madison, who began his preparation for the labors of the Convention at least a year before it met. (See Rives's Life and Times of Madison, vol. ii, p. 208, "Preparations of Madison for labors of Federal Convention.") In December, 1786, we find him in active correspondence with Jefferson, then at Paris, as to the Virginia plan. (See letter of Jefferson to Madison of December 16, 1786, in Jefferson's Correspondence, by T. J. Randolph, vol. ii, pp. 64, 65.) The marvel is that the historians who are supposed to have explored the sources have never taken the pains to ask this simple and inevitable question: From what common source did the draftsmen of the four plans draw the path-breaking invention which was the foundation of all of them? Let it be said to the honor of those draftsmen that no one of them ever claimed to be the author of that invention. Neither Madison, nor Charles Pinckney, nor Sherman, nor Ellsworth, nor Hamilton, nor any of their biographers, so far as the writer is informed, ever set up such a claim in behalf of any one of them. The answer to "the simple and inevitable question" just propounded is this: The common source from which the draftsmen of the four plans drew the path-breaking invention underlying them all was A Dissertation on the Political Union and Constitution of the Thirteen United States of North America, published at Philadelphia by Pelatiah Webster, February 16, 1783, and there republished by him, with copious notes, in 1791, and herein reproduced for the first time after the lapse of one hundred and sixteen years. In that immortal paper, whose lightest words are weighty, he gave to the world as his personal contribution to the science of government and as an entirety worked out in great detail the "whole novel theory" of Federal Government, upon which reposes the existing Constitution of the United States.

Prior to the date in question no single element of that theory had ever been propounded by anyone. In a note appended to the republication of 1791, the great inventor gives the following account of the circumstances under which the invention was made: "At the time when this dissertation was written (February 16, 1783) the defects and insufficiency of the old Federal Constitution were universally felt and acknowledged. It was manifest not only that the internal police, justice, security, and peace of the States could never be preserved under it, but the finances and public credit would necessarily become so embarrassed, precarious, and void of support that no public movement which depended on the revenue could be managed with any effectual certainty, but though the public mind was under full conviction of all these mischiefs and was contemplating a remedy, yet the public ideas were not at all concentrated, much less arranged into any new system or form of government which would obviate these evils. Under these circumstances I offered this dissertation to the public. How far the principles of it were adopted or rejected in the new Constitution, which was four years afterwards (September 17, 1787), formed by the general convention and since ratified by all the States, is obvious to everyone."

At the same time he added: "I was fully of opinion (though the sentiment at that time would not very well bear) that it would be ten times easier to form a new Constitution than to mend the old one. I therefore sat myself down to sketch out the leading principles of that political Constitution, which I thought necessary to the preservation and happiness of the United States of America, which are comprised in this dissertation. I hope the reader will please to consider that these are the original thoughts of a private individual, dictated by the nature of the subject only, long before the important theme became the great object of discussion in the most dignified and important assembly which ever sat or decided in America." The great inventor perfectly understood the merits of his own case which he thus stated with the lucidity of a Greek and the terseness of a Roman. As early as 1781 Pelatiah Webster was the first to propose to the people of the United States, in one of his financial essays published at Philadelphia in May of that year, the calling of "a Continental Convention" for the making of a new Constitution. (The fact that "Alexander Hamilton made the same suggestion in a private letter to James Duane, September 3, 1780," is of no importance. It was not a public act, not even a public declaration. See Gaillard Hunt's Life of James Madison, p. 108.) In bearing testimony to that fact Madison said that Pelatiah Webster, "after discussing the fiscal system of the United States, and suggesting, among other remedial provisions, one including a national bank, remarks, that 'the authority of Congress is very inadequate to the performance of their duties; and this indicates the necessity of their calling a Continental Convention for the express purpose of ascertaining, defining, enlarging, and limiting, the duties and powers of their Constitution.'" (The Madison Papers (1841), vol. ii, pp. 706–707.) Two years after he had thus sounded the tocsin for the States to assemble he made the invention and published to the world, in detail, the plan upon which the Constitution was to be formed. While the historian Bancroft (History of the Constitution of the United States, vol. i, p. 86) failed to appreciate the stupendous importance of his work, he frankly admits that he actually performed it when he says: "The public mind was ripening for a transition from a confederation to a real government. Just at this time Pelatiah Webster, a graduate of Yale College, in a dissertation published at Philadelphia, proposed for the legislature of the United States a Congress of two Houses which should have ample authority for making laws 'of general necessity and utility,' and enforcing them as well on individuals as on States. He further suggested not only heads of Executive Departments, but judges of law and chancery. The tract awakened so much attention that it was reprinted in Hartford, and called forth a reply." (It was replied to anonymously by Roger Sherman.) In both of the scanty and stingy biographical notices of him in the leading American encyclopedias the statement is made that his plan "is mentioned by James Madison as having an influence in directing the public mind to the necessity of a better form of government." Pelatiah Webster needs the admissions neither of Madison nor Bancroft to establish his title to the authorship of the "wholly novel theory" now embodied in the Constitution of the United States, because that title rests upon contemporary documentary evidence as clear and convincing as that upon which rests Jefferson's title to the authorship of the Declaration of Independence. If that be true, then he has made a larger personal contribution to the science of government than any other one individual in the history of mankind. Among our nation builders he stands second to Washington alone.

And yet among them all he only has been neglected and forgotten by his countrymen, not through any conscious omission, but because of a careless historical scholarship which has failed to present his great achievement in its true light. That conviction has impelled the undersigned, who has devoted more than thirty years to the special study of the origin and growth of our constitutional systems, State and Federal, to present to the Congress herein very briefly the historical data upon which Pelatiah Webster's right to immortality depends. He it was who first suggested the separate existence of the two Houses of Congress, when, in 1783, he said "that the Congress shall consist of two Chambers, an Upper and Lower House, or Senate and Commons, with the concurrence of both necessary to every act, and that every State send one or more Delegates to each House. This will subject every act to two discussions before two distinct Chambers of men equally qualified for the debate, equally masters of the subject, and of equal authority in the decision." Prior to that utterance no federal assembly, ancient or modern, had ever consisted of two chambers; no one had ever suggested such an idea. If after a careful examination of all the facts the Congress shall deem the architect of our Federal Constitution unworthy of a monument, the undersigned prays in his behalf that this humble memorial may be embodied in its records so that succeeding generations may determine for themselves whether or no his work has been justly judged.

I. Federal governments prior to and including that of 1776.

From the days of the Greek leagues down to the making of the second Constitution of the United States, all federal governments had been constructed on a single plan, at once clumsy and inefficient. The most perfect of the Greek leagues was the Achaian, of which the framers really knew nothing, as we learn from Madison, who tells us in the Federalist (xviii) that "could the interior structure and regular operation of the Achaian League be ascertained it is probable that more light might be thrown by it on the science of federal government than by any like experiments with which we are acquainted." The coveted knowledge was not accessible because the historical scholars who have since passed beyond the Greece of Thucydides into the Greece of Polybios, who have passed beyond the period in which the independent city commonwealth was the dominant political idea into the later and less brilliant period of Hellenic freedom occupied by the history of Greek federalism, had not then completed their investigations, only fully worked out in very recent years. (The first volume (History of Greek Federations) of Edward A. Freeman's great History of Federal Government was not published until 1863.) Such scanty knowledge as the framers did possess of Greek federalism seems to have been chiefly drawn from the little work of the Abbé Mably, Observations sur l'Histoire de Grèce (Federalist, xviii). The only federal governments with whose internal organizations the builders of our Federal Republic were really familiar, and whose histories had any practical effect upon their work, were those that had grown up between the Low Dutch communities at the mouth of the Rhine, and between the High Dutch communities in the mountains of Switzerland and upon the plains of Germany (Federalist, xix, xx). Down to the making of the second Constitution of the United States the confederation of Swiss Cantons, the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and the German confederation really represented the total advance made by the modern world in the structure of federal governments.

Such advance was embodied in the idea of a Federal system made up of a union of States, cities, or districts, representatives from which composed a single Federal assembly whose limited powers could be brought to bear, not upon individual citizens, but only upon cities or States as such. The fundamental principle upon which all such fabrics rested was the requisition system, under which the Federal assembly was only endowed with the power to make requisitions for men and money upon the States or cities composing the league for Federal purposes, while the States, alone, in their corporate capacity possessed the power to execute them. The initial effort of the English colonies in America along the path of Federal union ended with the making of the first Constitution of the United States embodied in the Articles of Confederation. Up to that point nothing new had been achieved; the fruit of the first effort was simply a confederation, constructed upon a plan over two thousand years old, which could only deal through the requisition system with States as States. That Confederation possessed no power (1) to operate directly upon the individual citizen; (2) it had no independent power of taxation; (3) the Federal head was not divided into three departments, executive, legislative, and judicial; (4) the Federal assembly consisted of one chamber instead of two. (See Pelatiah Webster's masterful analysis of the first Constitution contained in his Notes published in 1791, infra, p. 48.) The lack of power to levy and collect for itself Federal or national taxes rendered our first Federal Government preeminently a failure as a financial system, dependent as it was upon the will of thirteen independent legislatures.

II. Pelatiah Webster's invention and the second Federal Constitution of 1787.

The most scientific writer upon finance during the Revolutionary war was Pelatiah Webster, whose essays on that subject fill a volume. (The second edition of 1791 was "printed and sold by Joseph Crukshank, No. 91 High street," Philadelphia.) He was born at Lebanon, Conn., in 1725 and graduated at Yale College in 1746. In 1755 he removed to Philadelphia, where he became a prosperous merchant, and in due time an ardent supporter of the patriot cause in the war of the Revolution, aiding with pen and purse. He was captured by the British, and, on account of his ardor, was imprisoned for four months. As early as October, 1776, he began to write on the currency, and in 1779 he commenced the publication at Philadelphia of a series of "Essays on free trade and finance." He was sufficiently important as a political economist to be consulted by the Continental Congress as to the resources of the country. His financial studies soon convinced him that no stable fiscal system could be established until the then existing Federal Government was wiped out and superseded by one endowed with independent taxing power. Therefore, as early as 1781, in one of his financial essays, he made the first public call for the "Continental Convention," referred to by Madison, to be armed with power to devise an adequate system of Federal Government. Having thus taken the first step, he set himself to work to formulate in advance such an adequate system as the convention should adopt, whenever it might meet. In the great tract published at Philadelphia February 16, 1783, we have photographed for us the workings of his mind as he moved along paths never trod before. He sounded the keynote when he declared: "They (the supreme power) must therefore of necessity be vested with a power of taxation. I know this is a most important and weighty truth, a dreadful engine of oppression, tyranny, and injury, when ill-used; yet, from the necessity of the case, it must be admitted.

"For to give a supreme authority a power of making contracts without any power of payment—of appointing officers, civil and military, without money to pay them; power to build ships without any money to do it with, a power of emitting money without any power to redeem it, or of borrowing money without any power to make payment, etc.—such solecisms in government are so nugatory and absurd that I really think to offer further argument on the subject would be to insult the understanding of my readers. To make all these payments dependent on the votes of thirteen popular assemblies, who will undertake to judge of the propriety of every contract and every occasion of money and grant or withhold supplies according to their opinion, while at the same time the operations of the whole may be stopped by the vote of a single one of them, is absurd." Thus Pelatiah Webster proposed the existing system of Federal taxation, then entirely new, to the world; thus he proposed that the ancient system of requisitions resting on the taxing power of the State should be superseded by a system of Federal or national taxation extending to every citizen, directly or indirectly. Instead of the lifeless system of absurdity embodied in the Articles of Confederation, he proposed to substitute a self-executing and self-sustaining national system, based on the following propositions, stated in his own language: "The supreme authority of any State must have power enough to effect the ends of its appointment, otherwise these ends can not be answered and effectually secured. * * * I begin with my first and great principle, viz, that the Constitution must vest powers in every department sufficient to secure and make effectual the ends of it. The supreme authority must have the power of making war and peace, of appointing armies and navies, of appointing officers both civil and military, of making contracts, of emitting, coining, and borrowing money, of regulating trade, of making treaties with foreign powers, of establishing post-offices, and, in short, of doing everything which the well-being of the Commonwealth may require and which is not compatible to any particular State, all of which require money and can not possibly be made effectual without it. * * * This tax can be laid by the supreme authority much more conveniently than by the particular assemblies, and would in no case be subject to their repeals or modifications; and of course the public credit would never be dependent on or liable to bankruptcy by the humors of any particular assembly. * * * The delegates which are to form that august body, which are to hold and exercise the supreme authority, ought to be appointed by the States in any manner they please." In formulating his conclusions as to the supremacy of Federal law acting directly on all citizens, he said: "(1) No laws of any State whatever which do not carry in them a force which extends to their effectual and final execution can afford a certain or sufficient security to the subject—this is too plain to need proof. (2) Laws or ordinances of any kind (especially of august bodies of high dignity and consequence) which fail of execution are much worse than none; they weaken the government; expose it to contempt. * * * A government which is but half executed or whose operations may all be stopped by a single vote, is the most dangerous of all institutions. * * *

"Further, I propose that if the execution of any act or order of the supreme authority shall be opposed by force in any of the States (which God forbid!) it shall be lawful for Congress to send into such State a sufficient force to suppress it. On the whole, I take it that the very existence and use of our Union effectually depends on the full energy and final effect of the laws made to support it; and therefore I sacrifice all other considerations to this energy and effect, and if our Union is not worth this purchase we must give it up—the nature of the thing does not admit any other alternative." In these ringing terms was announced the path-breaking invention of a supreme and self-executing Federal Government operating directly upon the citizen; an invention for which the world had been waiting for 2,000 years; an invention of which no trace or hint is to be found in the constitutions of any of the Teutonic leagues, in the Articles of Confederation, or in the prior utterance of any other man.

Having thus defined his fundamental concept of a Federal government operating directly on the citizen, the great one boldly accepted the inevitable corollary that such a government must be strictly organized and equipped with machinery adequate to its ends—with the usual branches, executive, legislative, and judicial; with its army, its navy, its civil service, and all the usual apparatus of a government, all bearing directly upon every citizen of the Union without any reference to the government of the several States. No such federal government, ancient or modern, had ever existed. As Montesquieu was the first to point out, the division of state powers into executive, legislative, and judicial, originated in that single State in Britain we call England. (Spirit of Laws, bk. xi, ch. 6.) From that single State the principle passed into the single States of the American Union. (Federalist, xlvi.) Pelatiah Webster was the first to conceive of the application of the principle of the division of powers to a federal state; he was the first to propose that the federal head should be divided and then organized as the particular ones are into legislative, executive, and judicial. More than three years later Jefferson indorsed that idea by commending it to Madison. (In the letter written from Paris, December 16, 1786, heretofore cited.) Having thus made his second great invention, Webster proceeded to explain how the three departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, should be organized. His idea was that the executive power should be vested in a council of ministers to be grouped around a President elected by Congress. On that subject he said: "These ministers will of course have the best information and most perfect knowledge of the state of the nation, as far as it relates to their several departments, and will of course be able to give the best information to Congress in what manner any bill proposed will affect the public interest in their several departments, which will nearly comprehend the whole. The financier manages the whole subject of the revenues and expenditures; the secretary of state takes knowledge of the general policy and internal government; the minister of war presides in the whole business of war and defense; and the minister of foreign affairs regards the whole state of the nation, as it stands related to or connected with all foreign powers. * * * I would further propose that the aforesaid great ministers of state shall compose a council of state, to whose number Congress may add three others, viz, one from New England, one from the Middle States, and one from the Southern States, one of which to be appointed President by Congress." To the organization of the legislative department Webster gave elaborate consideration. Just as no prior federal government had ever been divided into three departments, so no prior federal legislature had ever been divided into two houses.

The one-chamber body represented by the Continental Congress was the type of every other federal assembly that had ever preceded it. As stated heretofore the path breaker, looking to the English bicameral system as it had appeared in the several States, proposed "That the Congress shall consist of two chambers, an upper and lower house, or senate and commons, with the concurrence of both necessary to every act; and that every State send one or more delegates to each house; this will subject every act to two discussions before two distinct chambers of men equally qualified for the debate, equally masters of the subject, and of equal authority in the decision." Citizens of the United States, to whom such a division now seems a matter of course, should remember that when Webster proposed it, it was an unprecedented novelty in the history of the world, so far as federal legislatures are concerned. After an elaborate discussion of the qualifications of Members of Congress, in which he sharply assailed the then existing rule forbidding their reelection, he proceeded to define a part of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States by saying "That the supreme authority should be vested with powers to terminate and finally decide controversies arising between different States." He also said, "To these I would add judges of law and chancery." Thus the entire Federal judicial system was distinctly outlined. Above all, he was careful to define the reserved powers of the States. On that subject he said: "I propose further, that the powers of Congress, and all the other departments acting under them, shall all be restricted to such matters only of general necessity and utility to all the States as can not come within the jurisdiction of any particular State, or to which the authority of any particular State is not competent, so that each particular State shall enjoy all sovereignty and supreme authority to all intents and purposes, excepting only those high authorities and powers by them delegated to Congress for the purposes of the General Union." In that passage we have the first draft, and a very complete one, of the tenth amendment. It provides that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." So it is a matter of documentary evidence that every element that entered into the "wholly novel theory, which may be considered a great discovery in modern political science," and which differentiates our second Federal Constitution of 1789 from every other that preceded it, was the deliberate invention of Pelatiah Webster, who announced to the world that theory, as an entirety, in his epoch-making paper of February 16, 1783. Prior to that date no federal government had ever existed (1) that operated directly on the individual citizen; (2) no federal government had ever been divided into three departments—executive, legislative, and judicial; (3) no federal legislature had ever been divided into an upper and lower house. There is no record, there is not even a claim that, prior to that date, any human being had ever propounded any one of those principles in connection with a federal government. The great inventor was so conscious at the time of the magnitude of the undertaking that he exclaimed as he wrote:

"May Almighty wisdom direct my pen in this arduous discussion." In conclusion he said: "This vast subject lies with mighty weight on my mind, and I have bestowed on it my utmost attention, and here offer the public the best thoughts and sentiments I am master of. * * * I have not the vanity to imagine that my sentiments may be adopted; I shall have all the reward I wish or expect if my dissertation shall throw any light on the great subject, shall excite an emulation of inquiry, and animate some abler genius to form a plan of greater perfection, less objectionable, and more useful." In his republication of 1791 he described perfectly the circumstances under which the great invention of February 16, 1783, was made, when he said that "The public ideas were not at all concentrated, much less arranged into any new system or form of government, which would obviate these evils. Under these circumstanees I offered this dissertation to the public." In that dissertation Pelatiah Webster presented, as a free gift to the great country that has neglected and forgotten him, the "new system or form of government" which passed, through the four plans" (at a later time a grave controversy arose as to "the singularly minute coincidences between the draft of a Federal government communicated by Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State," the Virginia plan, and the Constitution as finally adopted. Every explanation was given of "the singularly minute coincides," except the plain and obvious one—the four plans out of which the Constitution arose were taken from a common source. For a statement of the controversy in question see Rives' Life and Times of Madison, vol. ii, pp. 353–357) offered in the Federal Convention of 1787, into the existing Constitution of the United States. Certainly no more "wonderful work was ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." The outcome of that work was a novel and unique creation operating directly on the people, and not upon the States as corporations. The State governments are not subject to the central government. The people are subject to both governments. The new creation is in no respect Federal in its operation, although it is in some respects Federal in its organization. No one of the three basic principles constituting the great invention was seriously questioned in the convention. Its mighty and immortal task involved only their adaptation to very difficult and complex political conditions. The inventor of the plan stands to the members of the convention as an architect stands to master builders.

As an evidence of the highly practical temper of Pelatiah Webster the fact should be mentioned in conclusion that, having been a successful merchant, his pet hobby seems to have been to create a Department of Commerce in close touch with Congress. He said: "I therefore humbly propose, if the merchants in the several States are disposed to send delegates from their body, to meet and attend the sitting of Congress, that they shall be permitted to form a chamber of commerce, and their advice to Congress be demanded and admitted concerning all bills before Congress, as far as the same may affect the trade of the States." In his criticisms made in 1791 of the work of the Federal Convention he said that its failure to accept that suggestion was a great mistake. The very recent creation of a Department of Commerce and Labor has at last effectuated his idea. Only through the vista of receding years can such an epoch-making mind be viewed in all its grandeur. What signifies a century of neglect passed in the midst of the "momentous consequences" his mighty work was wrought. His time is at hand; his fame is as safe and as certain as the immortality of thought and the unerring justice of the tribunal of history. His abiding faith in the justice of that tribunal he clearly expressed when he said: "But if any of these questions should in future time become objects of discussion, neither the vast dignity of the convention, nor the low unnoticed state of myself, will be at all considered in the debates; the merits of the matter and the interests connected with or arising out of it will alone dictate the decision."

The humanly impossible and miraculous theory which has heretofore serenely assumed that the greatest and most unique of all political inventions had no inventor, can not survive a method of historical investigations, that undertakes to demonstrate that beneath every shell there is an animal, behind every document there is a man. The eminent French critic and historian, Ch. V. Langlais, has said: "History is studied from documents. Documents are the traces which have been left by the thoughts and actions of men of former times. There is no substitute for documents—no documents, no history." Strange, indeed, it is that the most important document connected with our constitutional history should now be presented to the jurists and statesmen of the United States as if it were a papyrus from Egypt or Herculaneum.

III. The epoch-making document of February 16, 1783, in which is embodied the first draft of the existing Constitution of the United States: A dissertation on the political Union and Constitution of the thirteen United States of North America, which is necessary to their preservation and happiness, humbly offered to the public. (First published in Philadelphia, 1783.)

I. The supreme authority of any state must have power enough to effect the ends of its appointment, otherwise these ends can not be answered and effectually secured; at best they are precarious. But at the same time,

II. The supreme authority ought to be so limited and checked, if possible, as to prevent the abuse of power or the exercise of powers that are not necessary to the ends of its appointment, but hurtful and oppressive to the subject; but to limit a supreme authority so far as to diminish its dignity, or lessen its power of doing good, would be to destroy or, at least, to corrupt it and render it ineffectual to its ends.

III. A number of sovereign states uniting into one commonwealth, and appointing a supreme power to manage the affairs of the union, do necessarily and unavoidably part with and transfer over to such supreme power so much of their own sovereignty as is necessary to render the ends of the union effectual; otherwise their confederation will be a union without bands of union, like a cask without hoops, that may and probably will fall to pieces as soon as it is put to any exercise which requires strength.

In like manner, every member of civil society parts with many of his natural rights, that he may enjoy the rest in greater security under the protection of society.

The Union of the Thirteen States of America is of mighty consequence to the security, sovereignty, and even liberty of each of them and of all the individuals who compose them; united under a natural, well-adjusted, and effectual Constitution, they are a strong, rich, growing power, with great resources and means of defense, which no foreign power will easily attempt to invade or insult; they may easily command respect.

As their exports are mostly either raw materials or provisions and their imports mostly finished goods, their trade becomes a capital object with every manufacturing nation of Europe and all the southern colonies of America; their friendship and trade will, of course, be courted, and each power in amity with them will contribute to their security.

Their union is of great moment in another respect; they thereby form a superintending power among themselves that can moderate and terminate disputes that may arise between different States, restrain intestine violence, and prevent any recourse to the dreadful decision of the sword.

I do not mean here to go into a detail of all the advantages of our union; they offer themselves on every view and are important enough to engage every honest, prudent mind, to secure and establish that union by every possible method, that we may enjoy the full benefit of it and be rendered happy and safe under the protection it affords.

This union, however important, can not be supported without a constitution founded on principles of natural truth, fitness, and utility. If there is one article wrong in such constitution, it will discover itself in practice by its baleful operation and destroy or at least injure the union.

Many nations have been ruined by the errors of their political constitutions. Such errors first introduce wrongs and injuries, which soon breed discontents, which gradually work up into mortal hatred and resentments; hence inveterate parties are formed, which, of course, make the whole community a house divided against itself, which soon falls either a prey to some enemies without, who watch to devour them, or else crumble into their original constituent parts and lose all respectability, strength, and security.

It is as physically impossible to secure to civil society good cement of union, duration, and security without a constitution founded on principles of natural fitness and right as to raise timbers into a strong, compact building which have not been framed upon true geometric principles; for if you cut one beam a foot too long or too short, not all the authority and all the force of all the carpenters can ever get it into its place and make it fit with proper symmetry there.

As the fate, then, of all governments depends much upon their political constitutions, they become an object of mighty moment to the happiness and well-being of society; and as the framing of such a constitution requires great knowledge of the rights of men and societies, as well as of the interests, circumstances, and even prejudices of the several parts of the community or commonwealth for which it is intended, it becomes a very complex subject, and of course requires great steadiness and comprehension of thought, as well as great knowledge of men and things, to do it properly. I shall, however, attempt it with my best abilities, and hope from the candor of the public to escape censure if I can not merit praise.

I begin with my first and great principle, viz: That the Constitution must vest powers in every department sufficient to secure and make effectual the ends of it. The supreme authority must have the power of making war and peace—of appointing armies and navies—of appointing officers both civil and military—of making contracts—of emitting, coining, and borrowing money—of regulating trade—of making treaties with foreign powers—of establishing post-offices, and in short of doing everything which the well-being of the Commonwealth may require, and which is not compatible to any particular State, all of which require money, and can not possibly be made effectual without it.

They must therefore of necessity be vested with a power of taxation. I know this is a most important and weighty truth, a dreadful engine of oppression, tyranny, and injury, when ill used; yet, from the necessity of the case, it must be admitted.

For to give a supreme authority a power of making contracts, without any power of payment; of appointing officers, civil and military, without money to pay them; a power to build ships, without any money to do it with; a power of emitting money, without any power to redeem it, or of borrowing money, without any power to make payments, etc.—such solecisms in government are so nugatory and absurd that I really think to offer further argument on the subject would be to insult the understanding of my readers.

To make all these payments dependent on the votes of thirteen popular assemblies, who will undertake to judge of the propriety of every contract and every occasion of money and grant or withhold supplies, according to their opinion, while at the same time the operations of the whole may be stopped by the vote of a single one of them, is absurd; for this renders all supplies so precarious and the public credit so extremely uncertain as must in its nature render all efforts of war and all regular administration in peace utterly impractical as well as most pointedly ridiculous. Is there a man to be found who would lend money or render personal services or make contracts on such precarious security? Of this we have a proof of fact, the strongest of all proofs, a fatal experience, the surest though severest of all demonstration, which renders all other proof or argument on this subject quite unnecessary.

The present broken state of our finances, public debts and bankruptcies, enormous and ridiculous depreciation of public securities, with the total annihilation of our public credit, prove beyond all contradiction the vanity of all recourse to the Federal assemblies of the States. The recent instance of the duty of 5 per cent on imported goods struck dead, and the bankruptcies which ensued on the single vote of Rhode Island, affords another proof of what it is certain may be done in like circumstances.

I have another reason why a power of taxation or of raising money ought to be vested in the supreme authority of our Commonwealth, viz, the moneys necessary for the public ought to be raised by a duty imposed on imported goods, not a bare 5 per cent or any other per cent on all imported goods indiscriminately, but a duty much heavier on all articles of luxury or mere ornament and which are consumed principally by the rich or prodigal part of the community, such as silks of all sorts, muslins, cambrics, lawns, superfine cloths, spirits, wines, etc.

Such an impost would ease the husbandman, the mechanic, and the poor; would have all the practical effects of a sumptuary law; would mend the economy and increase the industry of the community; would be collected without the shocking circumstances of collectors and their warrants, and make the quantity of tax paid always depend on the choice of the person who pays it.

This tax can be laid by the supreme authority much more conveniently than by the particular assemblies and would in no case be subject to their repeals or modifications, and of course the public credit would never be dependent on or liable to bankruptcy by the humors of any particular assembly. In an essay on finance which I design soon to offer to the public this subject will be treated more fully. (See my Sixth Essay on Free Trade and Finance, p. 229.)

The delegates which are to form that august body, which are to hold and exercise the supreme authority, ought to be appointed by the States in any manner they please; in which they should not be limited by any restrictions; their own dignity and the weight they will hold in the great public councils will always depend on the abilities of the persons they appoint to represent them there, and if they are wise enough to choose men of sufficient abilities and respectable characters, men of sound sense, extensive knowledge, gravity, and integrity, they will reap the honor and advantage of such wisdom.

But if they are fools enough to appoint men of trifling or vile characters, of mean abilities, faulty morals, or despicable ignorance, they must reap the fruits of such folly and content themselves to have no weight, dignity, or esteem in the public councils; and, what is more to be lamented by the Commonwealth, to do no good there.

I have no objection to the States electing and recalling their delegates as often as they please, but think it hard and very injurious both to them and the Commonwealth that they should be obliged to discontinue them after three years' service, if they find them on that trial to be men of sufficient integrity and abilities; a man of that experience is certainly much more qualified to serve in the place than a new member of equal good character can be. Experience makes perfect in every kind of business. Old, experienced statesmen of tried and approved integrity and abilities are a great blessing to a state; they acquire great authority and esteem as well as wisdom, and very much contribute to keep the system of government in good and salutary order; and this furnishes the strongest reason why they should be continued in the service, on Plato's great maxim, that "the man best qualified to serve ought to be appointed."

I am sorry to see a contrary maxim adopted in our American counsels; to make the highest reason that can be given for continuing a man in the public administration, assigned as a constitutional and absolute reason for turning him out, seems to me to be a solecism of a piece with many other reforms, by which we set out to surprise the world with our wisdom.

If we should adopt this maxim in the common affairs of life, it would be found inconvenient, e. g., if we should make it a part of our Constitution that a man who has served a three years' apprenticeship to the trade of a tailor or shoemaker should be obliged to discontinue that business for the three successive years, I am of opinion the country would soon be cleared of good shoemakers and tailors. Men are no more born statesmen than shoemakers or tailors. Experience is equally necessary to perfection in both.

It seems to me that a man's inducement to qualify himself for a public employment and make himself master of it must be much discouraged by this consideration, that, let him take whatever pains to qualify himself in the best manner, he must be shortly turned out, and of course it would be of more consequence to him to turn his attention to some other business, which he might adopt when his present appointment should expire, and by this means the Commonwealth is in danger of losing the zeal, industry, and shining abilities, as well as services, of their most accomplished and valuable men.

I hear that the State of Georgia has improved on this blessed principle and limited the continuance of their governors to one year; the consequence is they have already the ghosts of departed governors stalking about in every part of their State and growing more plenty every year; and as the price of everything is reduced by its plenty, I can suppose governors will soon be very low there.

This doctrine of rotation was first proposed by some sprightly geniuses of brilliant politics with this cogent reason: That by introducing a rotation in the public offices we should have a great number of men trained up to public service; but it appears to me that it will be more likely to produce many jacks at all trades, but good at none.

I think that frequent elections are a sufficient security against the continuance of men in public office whose conduct is not approved, and there can be no reason for excluding those whose conduct is approved and who are allowed to be better qualified than any men who can be found to supply their places.

Another great object of government is the apportionment of burdens and benefits, for if a greater quota of burden or a less quota of benefits than is just and right be allotted to any State, this ill apportionment will be an everlasting source of uneasiness and discontent. In the first case, the overburdened State will complain; in the last case, all the States whose quota of benefit is underrated will be uneasy; and this is a case of such delicacy that it can not be safely trusted to the arbitrary opinion or judgment of any body of men, however august.

Some natural principles of confessed equity, and which can be reduced to a certainty, ought, if possible, to be found and adopted, for it is of the highest moment to the Commonwealth to obviate, and, if possible, wholly to take away, such a fruitful and common source of infinite disputes as that of apportionment of quotas has ever proved in all States of the earth.

The value of lands may be a good rule, but the ascertainment of that value is impracticable; no assessment can be made which will not be liable to exception and debate—to adopt a good rule in anything which is impracticable is absurd, for it is physically impossible that anything should be good for practice which can not be practiced at all; but if the value of lands was capable of certain assessment, yet to adopt that value as a rule of apportionment of quotas, and at the same time to except from valuation large tracts of sundry States of immense value which have all been defended by the joint arms of the whole Empire, and for the defense of which no additional quota of supply is to be demanded of those States to whom such lands are secured by such joint efforts of the States, is in its nature unreasonable and will open a door for great complaint.

It is plain without argument that such States ought either to make grants to the Commonwealth of such tracts of defended territory or sell as much of them as will pay their proper quota of defense and pay such sums into the Public Treasury; and this ought to be done, let what rule of quota forever be adopted with respect to the cultivated part of the United States, for no proposition of natural right and justice can be plainer than this, that every part of valuable property which is defended ought to contribute its quota of supply for that defense.

If, then, the value of cultivated lands is found to be an impracticable rule of apportionment of quotas, we have to seek for some other, equally just and less exceptionable.

It appears to me that the number of living souls or human persons of whatever age, sex, or condition, will afford us a rule or measure of apportionment which will forever increase and decrease with the real wealth of the States, and will, of course, be a perpetual rule, not capable of corruption by any circumstances of future time; which is of vast consideration in forming a constitution which is designed for perpetual duration, and which will in its nature be as just as to the inhabited parts of each State as that of the value of lands or any other that has or can be mentioned.

Land takes its value not merely from the goodness of its soil, but from innumerable other relative advantages, among which the population of the country may be considered as principal, as lands in a full-settled country will always (cæteris paribus) bring more than lands in thin settlements. On this principle when the inhabitants of Russia, Poland, etc., sell real estates they do not value them as we do, by the number of acres, but by the number of people who live on them.

Where any piece of land has many advantages many people will crowd there to obtain them, which will create many competitors for the purchase of it, which will, of course, raise the price. Where there are fewer advantages there will be fewer competitors and, of course, a less price; and these two things will forever be proportionate to each other, and, of course, the one will always be a sure index of the other.

The only considerable objection I have ever heard to this is that the quality of inhabitants differs in the different States, and it is not reasonable that the black slaves in the Southern States should be estimated on a par with the white freemen in the Northern States. To discuss this question fairly I think it will be just to estimate the neat value of the labor of both, and if it shall appear that the labor of the black person produces as much neat wealth to the Southern State as the labor of the white person does to the Northern State, I think it will follow plainly that they are equally useful inhabitants in point of wealth, and, therefore, in the case before us should be estimated alike.

And if the amazing profits which the Southern planters boast of receiving from the labor of their slaves on their plantations are real, the Southern people have greatly the advantage in this kind of estimation; and as this objection comes principally from the Southward, I should suppose that the gentlemen from that part would blush to urge it any further.

That the supreme authority should be vested with powers to terminate and finally decide controversies arising between different States, I take it, will be universally admitted, but I humbly apprehend that an appeal from the first instance of trial ought to be admitted in causes of great moment, on the same reasons that such appeals are admitted in all the states of Europe. It is well known to all men versed in courts that the first hearing of a cause rather gives an opening to that evidence and reason which ought to decide it than such a full examination and thorough discussion as should always precede a final judgment in causes of national consequence. A detail of reasons might be added, which I deem it unnecessary to enlarge on here.

The supreme authority ought to have a power of peace and war, and forming treaties and alliances with all foreign powers, which implies a necessity of their also having sufficient powers to enforce the obedience of all subjects of the United States to such treaties and alliances, with full powers to unite the force of the States and direct its operations in war and to punish all transgressors in all these respects; otherwise, by the imprudence of a few, the whole Commonwealth may be embroiled with foreign powers and the operations of war may be rendered useless or fail much of their due effect.

All these I conceive will be easily granted, especially the latter, as the power of Congress to appoint and direct the Army and Navy in war, with all departments thereto belonging, and punishing delinquents in them all, is already admitted into practice in the course of the present unhappy war, in which we have been long engaged.

II. But now the great and most difficult part of this weighty subject remains to be considered, viz, how these supreme powers are to be constituted in such manner that they may be able to exercise with full force and effect the vast authorities committed to them for the good and well-being of the United States, and yet be so checked and restrained from exercising them to the injury and ruin of the States that we may with safety trust them with a commission of such vast magnitude—and may Almighty wisdom direct my pen in this arduous discussion.

1. The men who compose this important council must be delegated from all the States; and of course the hope of approbation and continuance of honors will naturally stimulate them to act right and to please; the dread of censure and disgrace will naturally operate as a check to restrain them from improper behavior; but however natural and forcible these motives may be, we find by sad experience they are not always strong enough to produce the effects we expect and wish from them.

It is to be wished that none might be appointed that were not fit and adequate to this weighty business; but a little knowledge of human nature, and a little acquaintance with the political history of mankind, will soon teach us that this is not to be expected.

The representatives appointed by popular elections are commonly not only the legal, but real, substantial representatives of their electors, i. e., there will commonly be about the same proportion of grave, sound, well-qualified men, trifling, desultory men—wild or knavish schemers—and dull, ignorant fools in the delegated assembly as in the body of electors.

I know of no way to help this; such delegates must be admitted as the States are pleased to send; and all that can be done is, when they get together, to make the best of them.

We will suppose then they are all met in Congress, clothed with that vast authority which is necessary to the well-being and even existence of the Union that they should be vested with; how shall we empower them to do all necessary and effectual good and restrain them from doing hurt? To do this properly, I think we must recur to those natural motives of action, those feelings and apprehensions, which usually occur to the mind at the very time of action; for distant consequences, however weighty, are often too much disregarded.

Truth loves light and is vindicated by it. Wrong shrouds itself in darkness, and is supported by delusion. An honest, well-qualified man loves light, can bear close examination and critical inquiry, and is best pleased when he is most thoroughly understood; a man of corrupt design, or a fool of no design, hates close examination and critical inquiry; the knavery of the one, and the ignorance of the other, are discovered by it, and they both usually grow uneasy before the investigation is half done. I do not believe that there is a more natural truth in the world, than that divine one of our Saviour, "He that doth truth, cometh to the light." I would therefore recommend that mode of deliberation, which will naturally bring on the most thorough and critical discussion of the subject, previous to passing any act; and for that purpose humbly propose:

2. That the Congress shall consist of two chambers, an upper and a lower house, or senate and commons, with the concurrence of both necessary to every act; and that every State send one or more delegates to each house; this will subject every act to two discussions before two distinct chambers of men equally qualified for the debate, equally masters of the subject, and of equal authority in the decision.

These two houses will be governed by the same natural motives and interests, viz, the good of the Commonwealth and the approbation of the people, whilst at the same time the emulation naturally arising between them will induce a very critical and sharp-sighted inspection into the motions of each other. Their different opinions will bring on conferences between the two houses, in which the whole subject will be exhausted in arguments pro and con, and shame will be the portion of obstinate convicted error.

Under these circumstances a man of ignorance or evil design will be afraid to impose on the credulity, inattention, or confidence of his house by introducing any corrupt or undigested proposition, which he knows he must be called on to defend against the severe scrutiny and poignant objections of the other house. I do not believe the many hurtful and foolish legislative acts which first or last have injured all the states on earth have originated so much in corruption as indolence, ignorance, and a want of a full comprehension of the subject, which a full, prying, and emulous discussion would tend in a great measure to remove; this naturally rouses the lazy and idle, who hate the pain of close thinking, animates the ambitious to excel in policy and argument, and excites the whole to support the dignity of their house and vindicate their own propositions.

I am not of opinion that bodies of elective men, which usually compose parliaments, diets, assemblies, congresses, etc., are commonly dishonest; but I believe it rarely happens that there are not designing men among them; and I think it would be much more difficult for them to unite their partisans in two houses, and corrupt or deceive them both, than to carry on their designs where there is but one unalarmed, unapprehensive house to be managed; and as there is no hope of making these bad men good, the best policy is to embarrass them and make their work as difficult as possible.

In these assemblies are frequently to be found sanguine men, upright enough, indeed, but of strong, wild projection, whose brains are always teeming with Utopian, chimerical plans and political whims very destructive to society. I hardly know a greater evil than to have the supreme council of a nation played off on such men's wires; such baseless visions at best end in darkness; and the dance, though easy and merry enough at first, rarely fails to plunge the credulous, simple followers into sloughs and bogs at last.

Nothing can tend more effectually to obviate these evils and to mortify and cure such maggoty brains than to see the absurdity of their projects exposed by the several arguments and keen satire which a full, emulous, and spirited discussion of the subject will naturally produce. We have had enough of these geniuses in the short course of our politics, both in our national and provincial councils, and have felt enough of their evil effects to induce us to wish for any good method to keep ourselves clear of them in the future.

The consultations and decisions of national councils are so very important that the fate of millions depends on them; therefore no man ought to speak in such assemblies without considering that the fate of millions hangs on his tongue; and, of course, a man can have no right in such august councils to utter undigested sentiments or indulge himself in sudden, unexamined flights of thought. His most tried and improved abilities are due to the States, who have trusted him with their most important interests.

A man must therefore be most inexcusable who is either absent during such debates or sleeps or whispers or catches flies during the argument, and just rouses when the vote is called to give his yea or nay, to the weal or woe of a nation. Therefore it is manifestly proper that every natural motive that can operate on his understanding or his passions, to engage his attention and utmost efforts, should be put in practice, and that his present feelings should be raised by every motive of honor and shame to stimulate him to every practicable degree of diligence and exertion to be, as far as possible, useful in the great discussion.

I appeal to the feelings of every reader, if he would not, were he in either House, be much more strongly and naturally induced to exert his utmost abilities and attention to any question which was to pass through the ordeal of a spirited discussion of another House, than he would do, if the absolute decision depended on his own House, without any further inquiry or challenge on the subject.

As Congress will ever be composed of men delegated by the several States, it may well be supposed that they have the confidence of their several States and understand well the policy and present condition of them. It may also be supposed that they come with strong local attachments and habits of thinking limited to the interests of their particular States. It may therefore be supposed they will need much information in order to their gaining that enlargement of ideas and great comprehension of thought which will be necessary to enable them to think properly on that large scale which takes into view the interests of all the States.

The greatest care and wisdom is therefore requisite to give them the best and surest information and of that kind that may be the most safely relied on to prevent their being deluded or prejudiced by partial representations made by interested men who have particular views.

This information may perhaps be best made by the great ministers of state, who ought to be men of the greatest abilities and integrity; their business is confined to their several departments and their attention engaged strongly and constantly to all the several parts of the same, the whole arrangement, method, and order of which are formed, superintended, and managed in their offices, and all informations relative to their departments center there.

These ministers will, of course, have the best information and most perfect knowledge of the state of the nation, as far as it relates to their several departments, and will, of course, be able to give the best information to Congress in what manner any bill proposed will affect the public interest in their several departments, which will nearly comprehend the whole.

The financier manages the whole subject of revenues and expenditures; the secretary of state takes knowledge of the general policy and internal government; the minister of war presides in the whole business of war and defense, and the minister of foreign affairs regards the whole state of the nation, as it stands related to or connected with all foreign powers.

I mention a secretary of state, because all other nations have one, and I suppose we shall need one as much as they, and the multiplicity of affairs which naturally fall into his office will grow so fast that I imagine we shall soon be under the necessity of appointing one.

To these I would add judges of law and chancery, but I fear they will not be very soon appointed—the one supposes the existence of law, the other of equity—and when we shall be altogether convinced of the absolute necessity of the real and effectual existence of both these we shall probably appoint proper heads to preside in those departments. I would therefore propose—

3. That when any bill shall pass the second reading in the House in which it originates, and before it shall be finally enacted, copies of it shall be sent to each of the said ministers of state, in being at the time, who shall give said House, in writing, the fullest information in their power and their most explicit sentiments of the operation of the said bill on the public interest, as far as relates to their respective departments, which shall be received and read in said House and entered on their minutes before they finally pass the bill, and when they send the bill for concurrence to the other House they shall send therewith the said informations of the said ministers of state, which shall likewise be read in that House before their concurrence is finally passed.

I do not mean to give these great ministers of state a negative on Congress, but I mean to oblige Congress to receive their advices before they pass their bills, and that every act shall be void that is not passed with these forms; and I further propose that either House of Congress may, if they please, admit the said ministers to be present and assist in the debates of the House, but without any right of vote in the decision.

It appears to me that if every act shall pass so many different corps of discussion before it is completed, where each of them stake their characters on the advice or vote they give, there will be all the light thrown on the case which the nature and circumstances of it can admit, and any corrupt man will find it extremely difficult to foist in any erroneous clause whatever, and every ignorant or lazy man will find the strongest inducements to make himself master of the subject, that he may appear with some tolerable degree of character in it; and the whole will find themselves in a manner compelled diligently and sincerely to seek for the real state of the facts and the natural fitness and truth arising from them, i. e., the whole natural principles on which the subjects depend, and which alone can endure every test, to the end that they may have not only the inward satisfaction of acting properly and usefully for the States, but also the credit and character which is or ought ever to be annexed to such a conduct.

This bill will give the great laws of Congress the highest probability, presumption, and means of right, fitness, and truth that any laws whatever can have at their first enaction, and will of course afford the highest reason for the confidence and acquiescence of the States and all their subjects in them; and, being grounded in truth and natural fitness, their operations will be easy, salutary, and satisfactory.

If experience shall discover error in any law—for practice will certainly discover such errors, if there be any—the legislature will always be able to correct them by such repeals, amendments, or new laws as shall be found necessary; but as it is much easier to prevent mischiefs than to remedy them, all possible caution, prudence, and attention should be used to make the laws right at first.

4. There is another body of men among us whose business of life and whose full and extensive intelligence, foreign and domestic, naturally make them more perfectly acquainted with the sources of our wealth, and whose particular interests are more intimately and necessarily connected with the general prosperity of the country than any other order of men in the States. I mean the merchants, and I could wish that Congress might have the benefit of that extensive and important information which this body of men are very capable of laying before them.

Trade is of such essential importance to our interests and so intimately connected with all our staples, great and small, that no sources of our wealth can flourish and operate to the general benefit of the community without it. Our husbandry, that great staple of our country, can never exceed our home consumption without this—it is plain at first sight that the farmer will not toil and sweat through the year to raise great plenty of the produce of the soil if there is no market for his produce when he has it ready for sale, i. e., if there are no merchants to buy it.

In like manner, the manufacturer will not lay out his business on any large scale if there is no merchant to buy his fabrics when he has finished them; a vent is of the most essential importance to every manufacturing country; the merchants therefore become the natural negotiators of the wealth of the country, who take off the abundance and supply the wants of the inhabitants, and as this negotiation is the business of their lives and the source of their own wealth, they, of course, become better acquainted with both our abundance and wants and are more interested in finding and improving the best vent for the one and supply of the other than any other men among us, and they have a natural interest in making both the purchase and supply as convenient to their customers as possible, that they may secure their custom and thereby increase their own business.

It follows, then, that the merchants are not only qualified to give the fullest and most important information to our supreme legislature concerning the state of our trade—the abundance and wants—the wealth and poverty of our people—that is, their most important interests—but are also the most likely to do it fairly and truly, and to forward with their influence every measure which will operate to the convenience and benefit of our commerce, and oppose with their whole weight and superior knowledge of the subject any wild schemes which an ignorant or arbitrary legislature may attempt to introduce to the hurt and embarrassment of our intercourse, both with one another and with foreigners.

The States of Venice and Holland have ever been governed by merchants, or at least their policy has ever been under the great influence of that sort of men. No States have been better served, as appears by their great success, the ease and happiness of their citizens, as well as the strength and riches of their Commonwealths; the one is the oldest and the other the richest State in the world of equal number of people; the one has maintained sundry wars with the grand Turk, the other has withstood the power of Spain and France; and the capitals of both have long been the principal marts of the several parts of Europe in which they are situated; and the banks of both are the best supported and in the best credit of any banks in Europe, though their countries or territories are very small and their inhabitants but a handful when compared with the great States in their neighborhood.

Merchants must, from the nature of their business, certainly understand the interests and resources of their country the best of any men in it; and I know not of any one reason why they should be deemed less upright or patriotic than any other rank of citizens whatever.

I therefore humbly propose, if the merchants in the several States are disposed to send delegates from their body to meet and attend the sitting of Congress, that they shall be permitted to form a chamber of commerce and their advice to Congress be demanded and admitted concerning all bills before Congress, as far as the same may affect the trade of the States.

I have no idea that the continent is made for Congress. I take them to be no more than the upper servants of the great political body, who are to find out things by study and inquiry, as other people do; and therefore I think it necessary to place them under the best possible advantages for information, and to require them to improve all those advantages, to qualify themselves in the best manner possible, for the wise and useful discharge of the vast trust and mighty authority reposed in them; and as I conceive the advice of the merchants to be one of the greatest sources of mercantile information which is anywhere placed within their reach, it ought by no means to be neglected, but so husbanded and improved that the greatest possible advantage may be derived from it.

Besides this, I have another reason why the merchants ought to be consulted. I take it to be very plain that the husbandry and manufactures of the country must be ruined if the present rate of taxes is continued on them much longer, and of course a very great part of our revenue must arise from imposts on merchandise, which will fall directly within the merchant's sphere of business, and of course their concurrence and advice will be of the utmost consequence, not only to direct the properest mode of levying those duties, but also to get them carried into quiet and peaceable execution.

No men are more conversant with the citizens, or more intimately connected with their interests, than the merchants, and therefore their weight and influence will have a mighty effect on the minds of the people. I do not recollect an instance in which the court of London ever rejected the remonstrances and advices of the merchants and did not suffer severely for their pride. We have some striking instances of this in the disregarded advices and remonstrances of very many English merchants against the American war, and their fears and apprehensions we see verified, almost like prophecies, by the event.

I know not why I should continue this argument any longer or indeed why I should have urged it so long, inasmuch as I can not conceive that Congress or anybody else will deem it below the dignity of the supreme power to consult so important an order of men, in matters of the first consequence, which fall immediately under their notice, and in which their experience, and of course their knowledge and advice, are preferable to those of any other order of men.

Besides the benefits which Congress may receive from this institution—a chamber of commerce, composed of members from all trading towns in the States—if properly instituted and conducted, will produce very many, I might almost say, innumerable advantages of singular utility to all the States. It will give dignity, uniformity, and safety to our trade; establish the credit of the bank; secure the confidence of foreign merchants; prove in very many instances a fruitful source of improvement of our staples and mutual intercourse; correct many abuses; pacify discontents; unite us in our interests, and thereby cement the general union of the whole Commonwealth; will relieve Congress from the pain and trouble of deciding many intricate questions of trade which they do not understand, by referring them over to this chamber, where they will be discussed by an order of men, the most competent to the business of any that can be found, and most likely to give a decision that shall be just, useful, and satisfactory.

It may be objected to all this, that the less complex and the more simple every constitution is the nearer it comes to perfection. This argument would be very good and afford a very forcible conclusion if the government of men was like that of the Almighty, always founded on wisdom, knowledge, and truth; but in the present imperfect state of human nature, where the best of men know but in part, and must recur to advice and information for the rest, it certainly becomes necessary to form a constitution on such principles as will secure that information and advice in the best and surest manner possible.

It may be further objected that the forms herein proposed will embarrass the business of Congress and make it at best slow and dilatory. As far as this form will prevent the hurrying a bill through the House without due examination, the objection itself becomes an advantage. At most these checks on the supreme authority can have no further effect than to delay or destroy a good bill, but can not pass a bad one; and I think it much better in the main to lose a good bill than to suffer a bad one to pass into a law. Besides it is not to be supposed that clear, plain cases will meet with embarrassment, and it is most safe that untried, doubtful, difficult matters should pass through the gravest and fullest discussion before the sanction of the law is given to them.

But what is to be done if the two Houses grow jealous and illnatured, and after all their information and advice grow out of humor and insincere and no concurrence can be obtained? I answer, sit still and do nothing until they get into a better humor. I think this is much better than to pass laws in such a temper and spirit as the objection supposes.

It is, however, an ill compliment to so many grave personages to suppose them capable of throwing aside their reason and giving themselves up like children to the control of their passions; or, if this should happen for a moment, that it should continue any length of time, is hardly to be presumed of a body of men placed in such high stations of dignity and importance, with the eyes of all the world upon them; but if they should, after all, be capable of this, I think it madness to set them to making laws, during such fits. It is best, when they are in no condition to do good to keep them from doing hurt, and if they do not grow wiser in reasonable time, I know of nothing better than to be ashamed of our old appointments and make new ones.

But what if the country is invaded, or some other exigency happens, so pressing that the safety of the State requires an immediate resolution? I answer, what would you do if such a case should happen, where there was but one house, unchecked, but equally divided, so that a legal vote could not be obtained? The matter is certainly equally difficult and embarrassed in both cases, but in the case proposed I know of no better way than that which the Romans adopted on the like occasion, viz, that both Houses meet in one Chamber and choose a dictator, who should have and exercise the whole power of both Houses till such time as they should be able to concur in displacing him, and that the whole power of the two Houses should be suspended in the meantime.

5. I further propose that no grant of money whatever shall be made, without an appropriation, and that rigid penalties—no matter how great, in my opinion, the halter would be mild enough—shall be inflicted on any person, however august his station, who should give order, or vote for the payment, or actually pay one shilling of such money to any other purpose than that of its appropriation, and that no order whatever of any superior in office shall justify such payment, but every order shall express what funds it is drawn upon, and what appropriation it is to be charged to or the order shall not be paid.

This kind of embezzlement is of so fatal a nature that no measures or bounds are to be observed in curing it; when ministers will set forth the most specious and necessary occasions for money and induce the people to pay it in full tale; and when they have gotten possession of it, to neglect the great objects for which it was given, and pay it, sometimes squander it away, for different purposes, oftentimes for useless, yea, hurtful ones, yea, often even to bribe and corrupt the very officers of government, to betray their trust, and contaminate the State, even in its public offices—to force people to buy their own destruction, and pay for it with their hard labor, the very sweat of their brow, is a crime of so high a nature that I know not any gibbet too cruel for such offenders.

6. I would further propose that the aforesaid great ministers of state shall compose a council of state, to whose number Congress may add three others, viz, one from New England, one from the Middle States, and one from the Southern States, one of which to be appointed president by Congress; to all of whom shall be committed the supreme executive authority of the States (all and singular of them ever accountable to Congress) who shall superintend all the executive departments, and appoint all executive officers, who shall ever be accountable to and removable for just cause by them or Congress, i. e., either of them.

7. I propose further that the powers of Congress, and all the other departments acting under them, shall all be restricted to such matters only of general necessity and utility to all the States as can not come within the jurisdiction of any particular State, or to which the authority of any particular State is not competent; so that each particular State shall enjoy all sovereignty and supreme authority, to all intents and purposes, excepting only those high authorities and power by them delegated to Congress for the purposes of the general union.

There remains one very important article still to be discussed, viz, what methods the Constitution shall point out to enforce the acts and requisitions of Congress through the several States; and how the States which refuse or delay obedience to such acts and requisitions shall be treated. This, I know, is a particular of the greatest delicacy, as well as of the utmost importance; and therefore, I think, ought to be decidedly settled by the Constitution, in our coolest hours, whilst no passions or prejudices exist, which may be excited by the great interests or strong circumstances of any particular case which may happen.

I know that supreme authorities are liable to err as well as subordinate ones. I know that courts may be in the wrong as well as the people; such is the imperfect state of human nature in all ranks and degrees of men; but we must take human nature as it is; it can not be mended; and we are compelled both by wisdom and necessity to adopt such methods as promise the greatest attainable good, though perhaps not the greatest possible, and such as are liable to the fewest inconveniences, though not altogether free of them.

This is a question of such magnitude that I think it necessary to premise the great natural principles on which its decision ought to depend. In the present state of human nature all human life is a life of chances; it is impossible to make any interest so certain but there will be a chance against it; and we are in all cases obliged to adopt a chance against us in order to bring ourselves within the benefit of a greater chance in our favor; and that calculation of chances which is grounded on the great natural principles of truth and fitness is of all others the most likely to come out right.

1. No laws of any State whatever which do not carry in them a force which extends to their effectual and final execution can afford a certain or sufficient security to the subject; this is too plain to need any proof.

2. Laws or ordinances of any kind (especially of august bodies of high dignity and consequence) which fail of execution are much worse than none; they weaken the government, expose it to contempt, destroy the confidence of all men, natives and foreigners, in it, and expose both aggregate bodies and individuals, who have placed confidence in it, to many ruinous disappointments which they would have escaped had no law or ordinance been made; therefore,

3. To appoint a Congress with powers to do all acts necessary for the support and uses of the Union, and at the same time to leave all the States at liberty to obey them or not with impunity, is, in every view, the grossest absurdity, worse than a state of nature without any supreme authority at all, and at best a ridiculous effort of childish nonsense; and of course,

4. Every State in the Union is under the highest obligation to obey the supreme authority of the whole, and in the highest degree amenable to it, and subject to the highest censure for disobedience—yet, all this notwithstanding, I think the soul that sins shall die, i. e., the censure of the great supreme power ought to be so directed, if possible, as to light on those persons who have betrayed their country and exposed it to dissolution, by opposing and rejecting that supreme authority, which is the band of our Union and from whence proceeds the principal strength and energy of our Government.

I therefore propose that every person whatever, whether in public or private character, who shall, by public vote or overt act, disobey the supreme authority shall be amenable to Congress, shall be summoned and compelled to appear before Congress, and, on due conviction, suffer such fine, imprisonment, or other punishment as the supreme authority shall judge requisite.

It may be objected here that this will make a member of assembly accountable to Congress for his vote in assembly; I answer, it does so in this only case, viz, when that vote is to disobey the supreme authority; no member of assembly can have right to give such a vote, and therefore ought to be punished for so doing. When the supreme authority is disobeyed, the Government must lose its energy and effect, and of course the empire must be shaken to its very foundation.

A government which is but half executed, or whose operations may all be stopped by a single vote, is the most dangerous of all institutions. See the present Poland and ancient Greece buried in ruins in consequence of this fatal error in their policy. A government which has not energy and effect can never afford protection or security to its subjects, i. e., must ever be ineffectual to its own ends.

I can not, therefore, admit that the great ends of our Union should lie at the mercy of a single State, or that the energy of our Government should be checked by a single disobedience, or that such disobedience should ever be sheltered from censure and punishment; the consequences are too capital, too fatal, to be admitted. Even though I know very well that a supreme authority, with all its dignity and importance, is subject to passions like other lesser powers, that they may be and often are heated, violent, oppressive, and very tyrannical; yet I know also that perfection is not to be hoped for in this life, and we must take all institutions with their natural defects or reject them altogether; I will guard against these abuses of power as far as possible, but I can not give up all government, or destroy its necessary energy, for fear of these abuses.

But to fence them out as far as possible, and to give the States as great a check upon the supreme authority as can consist with its necessary energy and effect, I propose that any State may petition Congress to repeal any law or decision which they have made; and if more than half the States do this, the law or decision shall be repealed, let its nature or importance be however great, excepting only such acts as create funds for the public credit, which shall never be repealed till their end is effected, or other funds equally effectual are substituted in their place; but Congress shall not be obliged to repeal any of these acts so petitioned against till they have time to lay the reasons of such acts before such petitioning States and to receive their answer; because such petitions may arise from sudden heats, popular prejudices, or the publication of matters false in fact, and may require time and means of cool reflection and the fullest information before the final decision is made; but if after all more than half of the States persist in their demand of a repeal, it shall take place.

The reason is the uneasiness of a majority of States affords a strong presumption that the act is wrong, for uneasiness arises much more frequently from wrong than right; but if the act was good and right, it would still be better to repeal and lose it than to force the execution of it against the opinion of a major part of the States; and, lastly, if every act of Congress is subject to this repeal, Congress itself will have stronger inducement not only to examine well the several acts under their consideration, but also to communicate the reasons of them to the States, than they would have if their simple vote gave the final stamp of irrevocable authority to their acts.

Further, I propose that if the execution of any act or order of the supreme authority shall be opposed by force in any of the States (which God forbid), it shall be lawful for Congress to send into such State a sufficient force to suppress it.

On the whole, I take it that the very existence and use of our Union essentially depends on the full energy and final effect of the laws made to support it; and therefore I sacrifice all other considerations to this energy and effect; and if our Union is not worth this purchase, we must give it up—the nature of the thing does not admit of any other alternative.

I do contend that our Union is worth this purchase; with it every individual rests secure under its protection against foreign or domestic insult and oppression; without it we can have no security against the oppression, insult, and invasion of foreign powers, for no single State is of importance enough to be an object of treaty with them, nor, if it was, could it bear the expense of such treaties or support any character or respect in a dissevered state, but must lose all respectability among the nations abroad.

We have a very extensive trade, which can not be carried on with security and advantage without treaties of commerce and alliance with foreign nations.

We have an extensive western territory, which can not otherwise be defended against the invasion of foreign nations bordering on our frontiers, who will cover it with their own inhabitants and we shall lose it forever, and our extent of empire be thereby restrained, and, what is worse, their numerous posterity will in future time drive ours into the sea, as the Goths and Vandals formerly conquered the Romans in like circumstances, unless we have the force of the union to repel such invasions. We have, without the union, no security against the inroads and wars of one State upon another, by which our wealth and strength, as well as ease and comfort, will be devoured by enemies growing out of our own bowels.

I conclude, then, that our Union is not only of the most essential consequence to the well-being of the States in general, but that of every individual citizen of them, and, of course, ought to be supported and made as useful and safe as possible by a constitution which admits that full energy and final effect of government which alone can secure its great ends and uses.

In a dissertation of this sort, I would not wish to descend to minutiæ, yet there are some small matters which have important consequences, and therefore ought to be noticed. It is necessary that Congress should have all usual and necessary powers of self-preservation and order, e. g., to imprison for contempt, insult, or interruption, etc., and to expel their own Members for due causes, among which I would rank that of nonattendance on the House or partial attendance, without such excuse as shall satisfy the House.

Where there is such vast authority and trust devolved on Congress, and the grand and most important interests of the empire rest on their decisions, it appears to me highly unreasonable that we should suffer their august consultations to be suspended or their dignity, authority, and influence lessened by the idleness, neglect, and nonattendance of its Members, for we know the acts of a thin House do not usually carry with them the same degree of weight and respect as those of a full House.

Besides, I think when a man is deputed a Delegate in Congress and has undertaken the business, the whole empire becomes, of course, possessed of a right to his best and constant services, which if any Member refuses or neglects, the empire is injured and ought to resent the injury, at least so far as to expel and send him home, that so his place may be better supplied.

I have one argument in favor of my whole plan, viz, it is so formed that no men of dull intellects, or small knowledge, or of habits too idle for constant attendance or close and steady attention, can do the business with any tolerable degree of respectability, nor can they find either honor, profit, or satisfaction in being there, and, of course, I could wish that the choice of the electors might never fall on such a man, or, if it should, that he might have sense enough (of pain, at least, if not of shame) to decline his acceptance.

For, after all that can be done, I do not think that a good administration depends wholly on a good constitution and good laws, for insufficient or bad men will always make bad work and a bad administration, let the Constitution and laws be ever so good. The management of able, faithful, and upright men alone can cause an administration to brighten and the dignity and wisdom of an empire to rise into respect, make truth the line and measure of public decision, give weight and authority to the government, and security and peace to the subject.

We now hope that we are on the close of a war of mighty effort and great distress against the greatest power on earth, whetted into the most keen resentment and savage fierceness which can be excited by wounded pride, and which usually rises higher between brother and brother offended than between strangers in contest. Twelve of the thirteen United States have felt the actual and cruel invasions of the enemy, and eleven of our capitals have been under their power, first or last, during the dreadful conflict; but a good Providence, our own virtue and firmness, and the help of our friends have enabled us to rise superior to all the power of our adversaries and make them seek to be at peace with us.

During the extreme pressure of the war, indeed, many errors in our administration have been committed when we could not have experience and time for reflection to make us wise, but these will easily be excused, forgiven, and forgotten if we can now, while at leisure, find virtue, wisdom, and foresight enough to correct them and form such establishments as shall secure the great ends of our Union and give dignity, force, utility, and permanency to our empire.

It is a pity we should lose the honor and blessings which have cost us so dear for want of wisdom and firmness in measures which are essential to our preservation. It is now at our option, either to fall back into our original atoms or form such a union as shall command the respect of the world and give honor and security to our people.

This vast subject lies with mighty weight on my mind and I have bestowed on it my utmost attention, and here offer the public the best thoughts and sentiments I am master of. I have confined myself in this dissertation entirely to the nature, reason, and truth of my subject, without once adverting to the reception it might meet with from men of different prejudices or interests. To find the truth, not to carry a point, has been my object.

I have not the vanity to imagine that my sentiments may be adopted. I shall have all the reward I wish or expect if my dissertation shall throw any light on the great subject, shall excite an emulation of inquiry, and animate some abler genius to form a plan of greater perfection, less objectionable, and more useful.

Notes appended by Pelatiah Webster to the republication made at Philadelphia in 1791.

NOTE 1.

1. Forming a plan of confederation, or a system of general government of the United States, engrossed the attention of Congress from the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, till the same was completed by Congress, July 9, 1778, and recommended to the several States for ratification, which finally took place March 1, 1781, from which time the said confederation was considered as the grand Constitution of the General Government and the whole administration was conformed to it.

And as it had stood the test of discussion in Congress for two years before they completed and adopted it and in all the States for three years more before it was finally ratified, one would have thought that it must have been a very finished and perfect plan of government.

But on trial of it in practice it was found to be extremely weak, defective, totally inefficient, and altogether inadequate to its great ends and purposes. For,

1. It blended the legislative and executive powers together in one body.
2. This body, viz, Congress, consisted of but one House, without any check upon their resolutions.
3. The powers of Congress in very few instances were definitive and final; in the most important articles of government they could do no more than recommend to the several States, the consent of every one of which was necessary to give legal sanction to any act so recommended.
4. They could assess and levy no taxes.
5. They could institute and execute no punishments, except in the military department.
6. They had no power of deciding or controlling the contentions and disputes of different States with each other.
7. They could not regulate the general trade; or,
8. Even make laws to secure either public treaties with foreign States, or the persons of public ambassadors, or to punish violations or injuries done to either of them.
9. They could institute no general judiciary powers.
10. They could regulate no public roads, canals, or inland navigation, etc.

And what caps all the rest was that (whilst under such an inefficient political constitution the only chance we had of any tolerable administration lay wholly in the prudence and wisdom of the men who happened to take the lead in our public councils) it was fatally provided by the absurd doctrine of rotation that if any Member of Congress by three years' experience and application had qualified himself to manage our public affairs with consistency and fitness that he should be constitutionally and absolutely rendered incapable of serving any longer till by three years' discontinuance he had pretty well lost the cue or train of the public councils and forgot the ideas and plans which made his service useful and important, and in the meantime his place should be supplied by a fresh man who had the whole matter to learn, and when he had learned it was to give place to another fresh man; and so on to the end of the chapter.

The sensible mind of the United States, by long experience of the fatal mischiefs of anarchy, or (which is about the same thing) of this ridiculous, inefficient form of government, began to apprehend that there was something wrong in our policy which ought to be redressed and mended; but nobody undertook to delineate the necessary amendments.

I was then pretty much at leisure, and was fully of opinion (though the sentiment at that time would not very well bear) that it would be ten times easier to form a new constitution than to mend the old one. I therefore sat myself down to sketch out the leading principles of that political constitution which I thought necessary to the preservation and happiness of the United States of America, which are comprised in this dissertation.

I hope the reader will please to consider that these are the original thoughts of a private individual, dictated by the nature of the subject only, long before the important theme became the great object of discussion in the most dignified and important assembly which ever sat or decided in America.

NOTE 2.

At the time when this dissertation was written (Feb. 16, 1783) the defects and insufficiency of the old Federal Constitution were universally felt and acknowledged; it was manifest not only that the internal police, justice, security, and peace of the States could never be preserved under it, but the finances and public credit would necessarily become so embarrassed, precarious, and void of support that no public movement which depended on the revenue could be managed with any effectual certainty; but though the public mind was under full conviction of all these mischiefs and was contemplating a remedy, yet the public ideas were not at all concentrated, much less arranged into any new system or form of government which would obviate these evils. Under these circumstances I offered this dissertation to the public. How far the principles of it were adopted or rejected in the new Constitution which was four years afterwards (Sept. 17, 1787) formed by the general convention, and since ratified by all the States, is obvious to everyone.

I wish here to remark the great particulars of my plan which were rejected by the convention.

1. My plan was to keep the legislative and executive departments entirely distinct; the one to consist of the two Houses of Congress, the other to rest entirely in the grand council of state.

2. I proposed to introduce a chamber of commerce, to consist of merchants, who should be consulted by the legislature in all matters of trade and revenue, and which should have the conducting the revenue committed to them.

The first of these the convention qualified; the second they say nothing of—i. e., take no notice of it.

3. I proposed that the great officers of state should have the perusal of all bills before they were enacted into laws, and should be required to give their opinion of them, as far as they affected the public interest in their several departments; which report of them Congress should cause to be read in their respective Houses, and entered on their minutes. This is passed over without notice.

4. I proposed that all public officers appointed by the executive authority should be amenable both to them and to the legislative power, and removable for just cause by either of them. This is qualified by the convention.

And inasmuch as my sentiments in these respects were either qualified or totally neglected by the convention, I suppose they were wrong; however, the whole matter is submitted to the politicians of the present age and to our posterity in future.

In sundry other things the convention have gone into minutiæ—e. g., respecting elections of President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress, etc., which I proposed to leave at large to the wisdom and discretion of Congress and of the several States.

Great reasons may doubtless be assigned for their decision, and perhaps some little ones for mine. Time, the great arbiter of all human plans, may after a while give his decision; but neither the convention nor myself will probably live to feel either the exultation or mortification of his approbation or disapprobation of either of our plans.

But if any of these questions should in future time become objects of discussion, neither the vast dignity of the convention nor the low, unnoticed state of myself will be at all considered in the debates; the merits of the matter and the interests connected with or arising out of it will alone dictate the decision.

Humbly presented by HANNIS TAYLOR.

RELIEF OF STORM SUFFERERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 173) for the relief of the sufferers from the cyclone which occurred in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana on April 24, 1908, which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It involves a matter of great urgency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to procure, in open market or otherwise, subsistence and quartermaster supplies, medicines, and medical aid, in addition to such supplies belonging to the military establishment and available, and issue same to such destitute persons as have been rendered homeless or are in needy circumstances as the result of the cyclone which occurred April 24, 1908, in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and in executing this joint resolution is directed to cooperate with the authorities of the said States.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BULKELEY. In accordance with the notice which I gave several days ago I ask to have Senate bill 5729 laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, the duties imposed upon the Committee on Military Affairs under the terms of the resolution instructing that committee to investigate the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906, were of an exceptional character. The conclusions of such investigation involved not only the honor of the Army, but the good character, both as men and soldiers, of all the men of the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry stationed at Fort Brown, Tex. (companies B, C, and D), but collaterally the four regiments of colored troops of the United States Army, of which those companies whose conduct is now in question have become the prominent representatives, and by whose conduct, in a measure, the future status of the colored soldier in the Army of the United States is to be determined.

The committee entered upon this investigation with a determination, if possible, to probe all the circumstances connected with the affray; to elicit all the facts so far as they could be ascertained; to obtain all the evidence, both direct and circumstantial, that would enable the committee to identify the guilty participants, whether soldiers or others possibly guilty, and have performed all these duties with which they were intrusted, and have gathered and reported all the evidence now obtainable. I am of the opinion that a visit by the committee to the scene of the affray and a personal inspection of the military post of Fort Brown, the city of Brownsville, and the surrounding country, an examination on the ground of all conditions there prevailing, both by day as well as by night, would have greatly aided the committee in drawing just and fair conclusions from the mass of evidence submitted for consideration. All the preliminary investigations upon which the order of the President dismissing the troops from the Army appear, from the records, to have been instituted on the theory that the men of the battalion stationed at Fort Brown were guilty participants in the affray. See orders General Garlington (p. 109, S. Doc. 155):

The President directs that you proceed to the places named in the accompanying letter and endeavor to secure information that will lead to the apprehension and punishment of the men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry believed to have participated in the riotous disturbance which occurred in Brownsville, Tex., on the night of the 13th of August, 1906. * * * And in this connection the President further authorizes you to make known to those concerned that unless such enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry as may have knowledge of the facts relating to the shooting, killing, and riotous conduct on the part of the men with the organizations serving at Fort Brown, Tex., on the night of August 13, 1906, report to you such facts and all the circumstances within their knowledge which will assist in apprehending the guilty parties, orders will be issued from the War Department discharging every man in Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry without honor, etc.

Mr. BURROWS. To whom was the order issued?

Mr. BULKELEY. To Major Blocksom. The investigation of the citizens' committee appointed the day after the affray in Brownsville from the inquiries instituted indicate the same thought; and I will read a question and answer that were propounded not only to one but to almost every witness who was called before the committee.

Investigation by citizens' committee, page 82, Senate Document No. 155:

Q. We are inquiring into the matter of last night, with a view to ascertaining who the guilty parties are. We know they were negro soldiers.

Page 85:

Q. You know the object of this meeting. We know that this outrage was committed by negro soldiers. We want any information that will lead to a discovery of whoever did it.

Page 110: Orders to Lieutenant-Colonel Lovering, September 24, 1906:

SIR: By direction of the division commander, I inclose you herewith the affidavits of * * * with reference to certain troubles which occurred at Brownsville, Tex., between soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry and civilians.

Hearings, part 2, page 11: Report of Major Blocksom and M. D. Purdy, assistant to the Attorney-General:

1. Testimony with reference to the assembling of the soldiers, the shooting from the barracks behind the garrison wall, the climbing over the garrison wall, and the shooting into the houses on the Garrison road, etc.

Page 162, part 2: Affidavit of Major Blocksom:

* * * I am a major and inspector-general in the United States Army; that on the 22d day of December, 1906, I was duly authorized and directed by the Secretary of War, through the proper official channels, to go to Brownsville and other places in the State of Texas, for the purpose of investigating the shooting affray committed in the city of Brownsville on the night of the 13th of August, 1906, in which it was alleged that certain members of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were implicated, etc.

I have been particular to recall all the orders issued on which this order of dismissal was founded, including some extracts from the proceedings of the citizens' committee to verify my conclusions—that up to the commencement of the investigation by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs it was practically assumed by the military, executive, and civil authorities that the troops, or some of them, were guilty of the "shooting up of the town," notwithstanding their persistent denial on all occasions of participation in the affray or any knowledge of parties engaged in the murderous raid—such protestations of innocence and lack of knowledge were at once construed as sufficient evidence of an additional crime, "a conspiracy of silence" to shield the guilty ones, of whom, it was assumed, they must necessarily have knowledge. I have never had called to my attention, Mr. President, in view of the testimony submitted to your committee, a more relentless pursuit of men accused of crime without an opportunity to be heard in their own defense, except to protest their innocence, or guilty knowledge which was at once construed as I have before indicated. It seems to me, Mr. President, that up to the time of the investigation by your committee the elementary principle of the criminal law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States has been, unwittingly perhaps, violated. I venture, as a layman, to quote:

The principle that there is a presumption of innocence in favor of the accused is the undoubted law, axiomatic and elementary, and its enforcement lies at the foundation of the administration of our criminal law. (156 U. S., 453.)

And in the same case:

A reasonable doubt, as that term is employed in the administration of the criminal law, is an honest, substantial misgiving, generated by the proof or the want of it. It is such a state of the proof as fails to convince your judgment and conscience and satisfy your reason of the guilt of the accused.

And in 155 United States, page 439, Justice Brewer says:

In a criminal trial the burden of proof is on the Government, and the defendant is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt; and when testimony contradictory or explanatory is introduced by the defendant, it becomes a part of the burden resting upon the Government to make the case so clear that there is no reasonable doubt as to the inferences and presumptions claimed to flow from the evidence.

This prosecution up to this point, Mr. President, might more rightfully be called a "persecution," for up to the hour of their dismissal these troops had never been given the opportunity of a hearing, either in a civil or a military court, if I except the proceedings before the grand jury of Cameron County, in which they could not participate and which resulted in a failure to find an indictment against the soldiers under arrest and selected by Captain McDonald, of the Texas Rangers, as those most likely to have been participants in the affray. In fact, Mr. President, I am bound to say that in all these preliminary proceedings, and continued down through your committee's investigation, there seemed an earnest desire on the part of every department of the Government connected with the military establishment to establish the justness and integrity of the orders of dismissal, rather than to accord to these men the "presumption of innocence" or the benefit of "a reasonable doubt" of their guilt.

For nearly two years these soldiers of our Army, with otherwise an untarnished record, have borne the odium of accusation and the disgrace of dismissal from the Army without honor uncomplainingly, enduring all these months confinement to post, additional and onerous military duties, both by day and night, in an effort to extort an admission of guilt, satisfied that time would disclose the real perpetrators of the great crime with which they were charged; that their good character as soldiers, and in civil life since their forced retirement from the Army, would win for them that measure of justice to which they feel they are entitled.

At this point, Mr. President, in view of what I have already said and in reply to the earnest appeal and timely suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, in which I heartily concur, that—

It is our duty to say to the people of this country that the party which gave the colored man his freedom will also teach him that this Government can only be preserved by observing the law.

To this warning to the negro I would add that in the administration of the law by executive, judicial, or administrative authority the citizen and the soldier is equally entitled to its observance and protection. It seems to me proper before proceeding to a discussion of the evidence in this case to review for a moment the claimed authority of law on which the dismissal of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry is founded:

The fourth article of war, regulating the separation of an enlisted man from the military service, reads as follows:

"ART. 4. No enlisted man, duly sworn, shall be discharged from the service without a discharge, in writing, signed by a field officer of the regiment to which he belongs, or by the commanding officer when no field officer is present; and no discharge shall be given to any enlisted man before his term of service has expired except by order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, or by sentence of a general court-martial."

The authority for a discharge from the military service is vested in a field officer of a regiment to which the enlisted man belongs or by the commanding officer when no field officer is present, and this power is limited only to the case of an enlisted man discharged before his term of service has expired, when the discharge must be issued by the same officer, upon the approval or order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, or the sentence of a general court-martial. It is evident from the wording of this fourth article that it was intended, and the practice and precedents in the Army would lead to the conclusion, that, in the case of individual enlisted men, the high reviewing officers named in article 4—the President, Secretary of War, or the commanding officer—were to decide finally on the propriety of the separation of the soldier from the service prior to the expiration of his enlistment, and on the approval of the officer named the usual official named in article 4 issued the discharge. It conferred no powers, except of final review and approval, upon the President, Secretary of War, or any other official, except that the sentence of the court-martial might terminate the service prior to the expiration of the term of service. For the protection of the soldier paragraph 146 of the Army Regulations provides:

146. The character given on a discharge will be signed by the company or detachment commander, and great care will be taken that no injustice is done the soldier. If the soldier's service has been honest and faithful, he will be entitled to such character as will warrant his reenlistment—that is, to character at least "good." Where the company commender deems the service not honest and faithful, he shall, if practicable, so notify the soldier at least thirty days prior to discharge, and shall at the same time notify the commanding officer, who will in every such case convene a board of officers—three, if practicable—to determine whether the soldier's service has been honest and faithful. The soldier will in every case be given a hearing before the board.

If the company commander is the commanding officer, he will report the facts to the next higher commander, who will convene the board. The finding of the board, when approved by the convening authority, shall be final. Discharge without honor on account of "service not honest and faithful" will be given only on the approved finding of a board of officers, as herein prescribed.

When an honorable discharge is given, following the action of the board, the fact will be noted on the discharge and on the muster rolls.

The proceedings of boards convened under this paragraph, showing all the facts pertinent to the inquiry, will be forwarded by the reviewing authority direct to the military secretary of the Army.

In the case of these soldiers none of the precautions provided by this article of war appear to have been complied with. The provision of paragraph 146 of the Army Regulations—

The soldier will in every case be given a hearing before the board—provided for in the article cited, and without whose approval no discharge without honor could be issued—

Discharge without honor on account of "service not honest and faithful" will be given only on the approved finding of a board of officers, as herein prescribed—was most certainly disregarded; it is not claimed that any such action was taken or forwarded to The Military Secretary of the Army by the reviewing authority, as required. No court-martial was ever held to try these soldiers for the offense with which they were charged, and which, if committed by them at all, was certainly of the gravest and most serious character and subject to the cognizance of either military or civil authority, as described in the opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General addressed to the Secretary of War under date of November 23, 1906 (S. Doc. 155):

If a soldier commits an offense of so serious a character as to warrant his discharge by way of punishment, charges are preferred and the case is tried by a general court-martial.

These soldiers were never allowed the benefits of either a hearing before the board of review, provided, or a trial before a general court-martial, at which they could appear and be heard, before their enforced dismissal and separation from the Army.

It is true that charges were preferred under the sixty-second article of war against the men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry (twelve in all), selected by Captain McDonald, of the Texas Rangers. I quote the charge and specification in the case of Sergt. George Jackson, of which similar charges and specifications were filed against each of the twelve men:

Charge and specification preferred against Sergt. George Jackson, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry.

Charge.—Conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in violation of the sixty-second article of war.

Specification.—In that Sergt. George Jackson, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry, did, without authority, take from the barracks of his or other company stationed at Fort Brown, Tex., one magazine rifle, caliber .30, model 1903, and did, singly or in company with other party or parties unknown, take part in a disturbance in the streets of Brownsville, Tex., in which disturbance one citizen of said town was killed and another wounded, by loading with ball cartridges and firing said rifle in said streets of said town and causing damage to property of inhabitants of said town.

FORT SAM HOUSTON, TEX., August 28, 1906.

Respectfully forwarded to the military secretary, Department of Texas, recommending trial by general court-martial. Under paragraph 962, Army Regulations, these charges have been investigated by the undersigned, as far as practicable with the means at hand, and I am of the opinion that it is doubtful if the allegations as set forth can be substantiated.

C. J. T. CLARKE,
Major, Twenty-sixth Infantry, Commanding.

And for whom warrants were issued by the civil authority—Judge Welch, one of the district court—but for what purpose? Avowedly and only as the sufficient answer to the demands of the sheriff of Cameron County for the surrender of these men to the civil authorities—that they were held to answer for a military offense, and for the further reason that authorities both at Washington and at Fort Brown did not believe that these men would receive fair treatment from citizens or authorities.

I quote now, for I think it is important as showing the situation there, from official documents, and all my quotations with a single exception during my discussion of this subject will be from the documents presented with the reports of your committee and now on the files of the Senate. I quote from the official record, Senate Document 155, page 46:

MILITARY SECRETARY,
War Department, Washington, D. C.:

Following telegrams received from Brownsville this date:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL, CAMP MABRY,
Austin, Tex.:

Have placed 3 sergeants, 3 corporals, and 6 privates in confinement in guardhouse here on warrants issued by Judge Wells, of charge of murder, conspiring to murder, etc., to be kept in confinement until required by judge. I do not believe these men will have unbiased trial here. An effort, in my opinion, should be made to have them tried elsewhere. I also fear for their safety if turned over to civil authorities, in case of mob violence, although authorities assure absolute protection. Feeling here still very bitter. Request opinion on my action.

PENROSE, Commanding.

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., August 23.

CHIEF OF STAFF, CAMP MABRY,
Austin, Tex.:

Battalion Twenty-fifth will probably get away to-night. Warrants have been issued for murder, conspiracy to murder, etc., against 3 sergeants, 3 corporals, 6 privates, and 1 ex-soldier. They will be turned over to post commander—Captain Preston, Twenty-sixth Infantry—for safe-keeping, and placed in post guardhouse until required by district judge. Don't know when this will be; probably early part of next month; possibly earlier. Authorities pledge themselves able to keep prisoners from violence. Feeling here high.

BLOCKSOM, Major.

In view of the excited state of feeling among citizens at Brownsville, I recommend that the Department of Justice be asked to take immediate steps for proper defense of these men, and that a change of venue be secured to some locality not affected by local excitement. I do not believe that the lives of these men will be safe if they are turned over to the civil authorities at Brownsville, nor will their witnesses be safe if sent back to that place. In view of present feeling, action looking to the immediate transfer of these men to another place of confinement pending trial is urged.

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

MILITARY SECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS:

One corporal, 2 privates, my company (D), ordered placed arrest and left here in connection shooting of August 13. I believe these men absolutely innocent, and do not believe will receive fair treatment from citizens and authorities. Request these men sent in arrest with company, to be tried before impartial tribunal, or that capable officer detained here care for their interests.

As I have before suggested, the reason why these charges were preferred under the sixty-second article of war are set forth in the letter of General Ainsworth, The Military Secretary here at Washington, now the Adjutant-General, under date of August 25.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 25, 1906.

COMMANDING GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS.
San Antonio, Tex.:

Confidential. After conference between Acting Attorney-General and Acting Judge-Advocate-General, it has been decided that enlisted men of battalion of Twenty-fifth Infantry en route to Fort Reno must be held without privileges and under strict surveillance as being in military custody either as offenders or witnesses in Brownsville case; also that if attempt is made by State authorities to serve additional process against individual soldiers of said battalion as offenders or witnesses the men must not be surrendered, but return to process must be made in each case to the effect that soldier is in military custody, and that as military jurisdiction has already attached compliance with process must be deferred. If you can reach battalion commander by wire, direct him to take this course should occasion arise, and act accordingly yourself, if necessary.

By order Acting Secretary of War:

AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 27, 1906.

THE COMMANDING GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio, Tex.:

The action of the State judge in vacating warrants already issued against accused soldiers of Twenty-fifth Infantry now detained at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., as reported in your telegram of August 26, leaves no charges pending against these soldiers. You will therefore cause military charges to be formally preferred against said soldiers under sixty-second article of war, alleging participation, either directly or by way of conspiracy, or both, in Brownsville disturbance. Orders for trial on said charges must not issue until investigation now under way is completed and acted upon here. Should new warrants issue by State authorities for said accused soldiers, or should they make demand upon you for the surrender of said soldiers for trial by State courts, make return thereto in each case that soldiers are now held in military custody for trial for the military offenses involved in their alleged participation in Brownsville disturbance and that compliance with State process must be deferred, and report your action to The Military Secretary.

Instruct commanding officer, Fort Reno, to hold all soldiers of the three companies of Twenty-fifth Infantry at his post as witnesses in military investigation now proceeding of Brownsville disturbance and in military trials which may result therefrom; also to place in confinement such soldiers of these companies as there is reasonable evidence to believe implicated in said disturbance, either directly or by way of conspiracy, or both, and to prefer formal charges against said soldiers under the sixty-second article of war. Orders for trial on such charges must not issue until investigation now under way is completed and acted upon here. Should attempt be made by State authorities to serve additional warrants or subpœnas at Fort Reno, instruct commanding officer to make return thereto that the soldiers are held by military authorities for trial for military offenses involved in their alleged participation in Brownsville disturbance, or as witnesses in such trials, and that compliance with State process must for the present be deferred.

By order Acting Secretary of War:

AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 24, 1906.

COMMANDING GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
Camp Mabry, Austin, Tex.:

Confidential. Following telegram just sent to commanding officer, Fort Brown, Tex., where battalion of Twenty-fifth Infantry has been held since morning:

Confidential. All men of Twenty-fifth Infantry who are now in custody of military authorities, including those for whom warrants have been issued by civil authorities, will be sent immediately with battalion to Fort Sam Houston and delivered to military authorities there. They will be held there until they can be turned over safely to civil authorities. Battalion will remain at Fort Sam Houston until sufficient white troops reach there to guard and protect prisoners. Battalion will then proceed immediately to Fort Reno. This movement of accused men should not be announced in advance, and should be made so as to avoid attracting attention or bringing on conflict with civil authorities. There is no intention of taking these men beyond jurisdiction of State of Texas or of withholding them from civil authorities a moment beyond time when they can be turned over safely. It is not believed safe to leave them at Fort Brown, as the one company to be left there is insufficient to do work of shipping property and supplies and at same time guard prisoners so as to prevent their escape or protect them if need be. You can make this explanation if it becomes necessary. The President himself directs the action herein ordered. You are authorized to make all necessary arrangements with railroad companies without referring matter to higher authority, and to arrange for holding train at San Antonio for reembarkation of battalion. Make movement quietly and discreetly. By all means avoid conflict if possible, but see that accused men and battalion are protected from violence during movement. Instructions have been wired to department commander, if possible, to have troops meet your train at San Antonio and relieve you of accused men, so that you can proceed direct to Fort Reno. Communicate with Department commander at Camp Mabry, if possible. Start your movement at earliest possible moment.

By order Acting Secretary of War:

AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS,
Laredo, Tex., September 6, 1906.

Hon. WM. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg leave to submit the following report covering my investigations in the matter of the negro soldiers at Brownsville, Tex.:

August 28, ultimo, I received a telegram from United States Attorney McLemore requesting me to go at once to Brownsville, Tex., "consult with military and civil authorities and report in detail situation and facts whether in your opinion accused soldiers can now get fair trial at Brownsville and be afforded protection by civil authorities against mob violence; if not whether civil authorities will consent to change of venue, * * * report to Attorney-General." I immediately started for Brownsville via Monterey and Matamoros, Mexico, being the quickest route. I was fortunate on my journey to encounter several prominent persons who had been in Brownsville the night of the trouble with the negroes and afterward. In order to arrive at an opinion of the feeling and conditions existing in Brownsville, I began a series of questions with them as well as others I met who could give me information on these points. After arrival in Brownsville I interrogated and consulted the military officer making an inspection for the War Department, Major Blastock [Blocksom], county judge, mayor of Brownsville, chairman of the Citizens' Protection Committee, ex-district judge, collector of customs, inspector of customs, and citizens generally, poor, rich, and indifferent races, endeavoring, as nearly as possible, to feel the pulse of the entire body corporate, and judge of the sentiment existing.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask the Senator if it is not true that in an official report made by Major Blocksom he also expressed the opinion that there could not be a fair trial in Brownsville?

Mr. BULKELEY. I think you will find that in the record. I do not happen to have it among my quotations, but I want to quote a few words from the assistant United States attorney, to whom this question was submited by the military authorities. Assistant United States Attorney Hamilton continues:

I found the officials, and with very few exceptions all the citizens, most frank and courteous in expressing their views and opinions on the matter, and I had no difficulty in determining that such a prejudice existed against the accused negro soldiers that a fair trial or any trial could not be obtained in Cameron County. In fact, some of the best citizens expressed the wish that the soldiers might not be returned to Brownsville even for a trial, as they feared that, although the citizens had acted with the greatest prudence hitherto and refrained from any violence toward the soldiers, some firebrand might start trouble, and, once commenced, no telling where it might end. I also consulted with the State district judge and district attorney. They agreed that it would be impossible to try the case in Cameron County, and the judge gave me to understand that the cases, if any indictment were found, would be transferred to some county free from prejudice, possibly Nueces. In going over the evidence with the officials we were impressed with the difficulty of identifying any of the culprits, and there is great likelihood that no indictments can be found. The governor of Texas has offered a reward of $500 for evidence leading to the conviction of the guilty ones, but it has produced no evidence thus far. My telegram to you from Brownsville covered this matter briefly. As to mob violence, I believe the hot-heads were governed by the prudence of the best counsel to refrain from any overt act, but that this was brought about mainly by the fact that there was a battalion of soldiers that would have to be overcome to reach the accused, I think, can be little doubted.

Were the accused to be taken back to Brownsville for trial, should indictments be found, and such trial result in an acquittal, I fear, unless the accused were well guarded, there might be trouble before they could reach a place of safety. The city of Brownsville, without doubt, has suffered a terrible and unreasonable attack by soldiers, who should have acted just the opposite in affording them protection, and they are righteously indignant. As my instructions did not include a finding of the facts concerning the attack and the crime committed, I presume it is not desired. If, however, details of the attack and facts connected are desired, they can readily be had from the War Department from Inspector-General, as Major Blastock [Blocksom] and I know that he was very careful in gathering an unbiased mass of information and facts.

The chances are that unless the soldiers clean up their own quarters or turn State's evidence no conviction can ever be had of the guilty who have caused the disturbance and trouble.

I trust that I have fully covered the information desired in this report, and have the honor of being,

Your obedient servant,

A. C. HAMILTON,
Assistant United States Attorney.

PRECEDENTS.

The records of the Regular Army fail to disclose any precedent for the discharge of a large body of enlisted men at one time, either prior to or at the end of their enlistment.

I quote from letter of The Military Secretary, General Ainsworth, under date of December 10, 1906, addressed to the Secretary of War:

No record of the summary discharge from the Regular Army, prior to the recent discharge of a battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, of a considerable number of enlisted men at one time has been found.

Cases of the discharge of individual enlisted men without honor and without trial by court-martial are not infrequent. The official records show that during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, discharges without honor were ordered by the War Department, without trial by court-martial, in the cases of 352 enlisted men of the Regular Army. Of these 86 were discharged on account of "fraudulent enlistment," 113 on account of "desertion," 8 on account of "desertion and fraudulent enlistment," 107 on account of "imprisonment under sentence of civil court," and 38 on account of "having become disqualified for service through own misconduct."

I ask that the letter from which I have just quoted may be printed in full in the RECORD.

Pages 312–313, Senate Document 155:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The Secretary to the President, in a letter dated December 7, 1906, advises the Secretary of War that the President wishes him to "give him some instances, of which he knows there must be many, where the Department, the commanding generals of departments, or colonels of regiments have discharged men or mustered them out without honor in any other way without court-martial."

A memorandum, furnished by The Military Secretary to the Secretary of War and by him transmitted to the secretary to the President on the 5th instant, contained a list of a number of instances of the summary discharge from the volunteer service during the civil war of large numbers of men because of misconduct on their part.

No record of the summary discharge from the Regular Army, prior to the recent discharge of a battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, of a considerable number of enlisted men at one time has been found.

Cases of the discharge of individual enlisted men without honor, and without trial by court-martial, are not infrequent. The official records show that during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, discharges without honor were ordered by the War Department, without trial by court-martial, in the cases of 352 enlisted men of the Regular Army. Of these, 86 were discharged on account of "fraudulent enlistment," 113 on account of "desertion," 8 on account of "desertion and fraudulent enlistment," 107 on account of "imprisonment under sentence of civil court," and 38 on account of "having become disqualified for service through own misconduct."

In addition to the discharges without honor ordered by the War Department, a considerable number of the discharges issued by subordinate military authorities must, under paragraph 148 (2–d), Army Regulations, have been discharges without honor. That paragraph requires the blank form for discharge without honor to be used when a soldier is discharged: "(d) Where the service has not been honest and faithful—that is, where the service does not warrant his reenlistment." The number of such discharges can not be ascertained without an examination of the record of each of the many enlisted men who were discharged during the year. Such an extended examination has not been made, because it is believed that the foregoing statement with regard to the discharges without honor ordered by the War Department is sufficient to show the general practice of the Department with regard to such discharges.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
December 10, 1906.

This letter shows to what extent and for what reason, in individual cases only, the powers conferred on the President, Secretary of War, and so forth, by the fourth article of war have been exercised. The official records show that during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, discharges without honor were ordered by the War Department, without trial by court-martial, in the cases of 352 enlisted men of the Regular Army. Of these there were discharged—

Eighty-six on account of "fraudulent enlistment."

One hundred and thirteen on account of "desertion."

Eight on account of "desertion and fraudulent enlistment."

One hundred and seven on account of "imprisonment under sentence of civil court."

Thirty-eight on account of "having become disqualified for service through own misconduct."

These are the causes for the discharge without honor of the individual enlisted men on the order of the President or of the Secretary of War, without a trial, during the year 1906.

And again, under date of December 5, General Ainsworth writes to the Secretary of War:

A protracted examination of the official records has thus far resulted in failure to discover a precedent in the Regular Army for the discharge of those members of three companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who were present on the night of the 13th of August, 1906, when an affray in the city of Brownsville took place.

In an effort to seek precedents an attempt is made to show that in the case of Company G, Eighth Infantry, United States Army, occurring in 1860, at that time a part of the command of Lieut. Col. Robert E. Lee, that a precedent can be found; but in that case the men of the offending company were not dismissed, but simply transferred to other companies of the same regiment and prohibited from reenlistment at the expiration of their respective terms, and the latter portion of the order was disregarded, if ever issued, as the Army records show. The Military Secretary adds:

In view of the foregoing statement it will be seen that the action taken in 1860, in the case of Company G, Eighth Infantry, is not a precedent for the action taken in 1906 in the case of the members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

Permit me, Mr. President, also to call attention and to have included in full in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, without reading that part from which I quote, Senate Document 155 and Appendix:

Pages 311–312:

Instances of the summary discharge of whole organizations for misconduct; also of the summary discharge, without honor, of individual enlisted men.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The Secretary to the President, in a letter dated December 1, 1906, advises the Secretary of War that the President would like to have him "look up any precedents (Lee's or others) for the action taken in discharging the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, and if there exist any such, send them to the President."

A protracted examination of the official records has thus far resulted in failure to discover a precedent in the Regular Army for the discharge of those members of three companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who were present on the night of August 13, 1906, when an affray in the city of Brownsville took place.

The case referred to as "Lee's" by the Secretary to the President is undoubtedly the case of Company G, Eighth Infantry, concerning which an interview with Mr. J. C. Hesse was recently published in the Washington Post. In that interview it was stated that, by order of Lieut. Col. Robert E. Lee, the members of Company G were transferred to other companies of the same regiment and prohibited from reenlisting on the expiration of the terms of enlistment under which they were then serving. A search for papers containing details of the occurrence has resulted in failure to find them, the original papers having been returned in 1860 to the Department of Texas, where they were undoubtedly lost or destroyed at the time of the surrender of the troops in that department to the Confederate military authorities.

The records show, however, that on March 18, 1860, members of Company G, Eighth Infantry, at Fort Davis, Tex., took from the guardhouse a citizen who was confined there and, without opposition from the guard, hanged him to a tree near by until he was dead. The records also show that by order of the regimental commander twenty-seven men of this company were detached from the company and attached to other companies of the regiment, "to restore their discipline," and that twelve other men of the company were transferred to other companies by order of the regimental commander without the cause of transfer being stated. The regimental orders are not on file, and it is impossible to state whether the reenlistment of these transferred men was or was not prohibited; but as the records show that some of the transferred men did reenlist, it is evident that if an order prohibiting their reenlistment was given it was not carried into effect.

In view of the foregoing statement it will be seen that the action taken in 1860 in the case of Company G, Eighth Infantry, is not a precedent for the action taken in 1906 in the case of members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

In the volunteer service during the civil war there occurred numerous instances of the summary discharge of large numbers of men because of misconduct on their part. Following are some of those instances:

The members of Company A, First Eastern Shore Maryland Infantry Volunteers, were mustered out of service August 16, 1862, by order of the general commanding the Eighth Army Corps because they refused to serve in Virginia.

The members of Company K, First Eastern Shore Maryland Infantry Volunteers were dishonorably discharged without trial, July 2, 1863, pursuant to the order of the general commanding the Eighth Army Corps, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, for refusing to leave the section of the State in which it was claimed that they had enlisted to serve. The action was approved by the Secretary of War July 23, 1863.

The First Regiment, United States Reserve Corps (Missouri Infantry), was mustered out of service during September and October, 1862, pursuant to orders of the War Department, on account of the regiment being in a state bordering closely on mutiny as a result of alleged misunderstanding as to the terms of enlistment.

Companies H, I, and K, Fifth Missouri Cavalry, and Company G, Fourth Missouri Cavalry, were mustered out of the service of the United States without trial by court-martial, in pursuance of orders from headquarters District of Missouri, dated September 20, 1862, by reason of mutinous conduct and disaffection of the majority of the members of those companies.

Company C, Fremont Body Guard, was summarily discharged by order of Major-General Halleck, November 30, 1861, on account of the members resfusing to be consolidated with any other organization of Missouri volunteers.

The members of Company G, Tenth New Jersey Infantry Volunteers, were discharged without trial April 8, 1862, pursuant to orders from the War Department, because they refused to do duty as infantry, claiming that they were deceived into the belief that they were entering the cavalry branch when they enlisted.

The Eleventh Regiment, New York Infantry Volunteers (First Fire Zouaves), was mustered out of service June 2, 1862, pursuant to orders from the War Department, by reason of general demoralization, numerous desertions, and at the request of officers and enlisted men of the organization.

The Sixtieth Regiment, Ohio Infantry Volunteers, was summarily discharged November 10, 1862, pursuant to a telegram from the War Department, because the regiment was "disorganized, mutinous, and worthless."

APPENDIX 4.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 1, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. LOEB: Herewith I send you a clipping from the Washington Post of November 28, 1906, containing the article referred to in your note of this morning.

The "Captain" Hesse referred to in that article was Corpl. John C. Hesse, of Company G, Eighth Infantry, and he was clerk at regimental headquarters at the time of the occurrence. Subsequently, when the regiment was surrendered to the Confederates by General Twiggs, Corporal Hesse saved the regimental flags by wrapping them around his body, under his clothing, and brought them north in safety, receiving afterwards a medal of honor for his action.

Mr. Hesse has been a clerk in the War Department since 1861, and is now a chief of division in The Military Secretary's Office.

Very truly, yours,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President, Washington, D. C.

[Inclosure.]

[From the Washington Post, Wednesday, November 28, 1906.]

LEE PUNISHED TROOPS—ENTIRE COMPANY DISBANDED BECAUSE OF LYNCHING—LIKE THE BROWNSVILLE CASE—CAPT. J. C. HESSE TELLS OF AFFAIR DOWN IN TEXAS JUST BEFORE THE CIVIL WAR WHICH IS A PARTIAL PRECEDENT FOR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S NOW FAMOUS ORDER—SOME FEATURES IDENTICAL.

A case somewhat similar to the recent dismissal, by Presidential order, of the three companies of colored troops because of the trouble at Brownsville, Tex., is that of the discharge of Company G, of the Eighth Regiment, at Fort Davis, Tex., in the summer of 1860.

In the Brownsville incident, as a result of the alleged rioting of the soldiers, one man, a bartender, was killed. The victim in the Fort Davis affair also was a bartender, he having been lynched by unknown parties, supposed to be soldiers, after he had killed a member of the company by striking him with his fist. The soldiers at Brownsville were ordered dismissed without honor by the President, while the soldiers at Fort Davis were transferred to other companies and not dismissed until they had served out their terms of enlistment.

The latter incident occurred during the Administration of President Buchanan, but there is no record that the action in the case was taken by virtue of any order given by him. The responsibility for the order was assumed by Robert E. Lee, later the famous Confederate general, who was at that time in command of United States troops in Texas.

NO RECORD OF DISMISSAL.

Possibly on account of the civil war breaking out soon after the incident, or it might have been because of the destruction of the records in the case before they reached the War Department, it is thought no official record of the dismissal of the company is in existence. At least so says Capt. J. C. Hesse, who is probably the only surviving member of the company, now employed in the office of The Military Secretary of the Army.

Captain Hesse, in speaking of the occurrence yesterday, said he had often regretted he had kept no diary during his Army service, referring especially to the affair at Fort Davis, which he said he regarded as one of the most interesting of his career. Although he was transferred with the other sixty-five members of the company, and it was ordered that at the end of his enlistment he should not be allowed to reenlist, Captain Hesse, through a personal appeal to Colonel Lee, and on account of his previous record for integrity, was absolved from any blame in the matter and was given a clear record. He had been transferred to Company A of the Eighth Regiment, and at the end of his term he enlisted again and served with honor in the civil war. Before the end of the war he was transferred to Washington to take up work in the general service.

FLED FOR HIS LIFE.

"It happened on the night of St. Patrick's Day in 1860," said Captain Hesse. "After tattoo some of the soldiers went into a saloon, where, in the midst of a quarrel, the barkeeper struck one of the men on the neck, causing his death. The occurrence caused great excitement among the men, and the barkeeper fled for his life. Soon after he turned up at post headquarters and appealed that he be saved from the hands of the mob, which he said was pursuing him. He was ordered placed in the guardhouse and the guard was increased.

"The next night the corporal of the guard took four of the men for the purpose of making the 'grand rounds.' During the absence of the corporal and the men the guardhouse was forced open and the bar-keeper taken away. The corporal, returning a half hour later, instituted a search, with the result that the barkeeper was found hanging to a tree dead, his body yet warm.

"The alarm was given immediately to the officer of the day, who ordered that an investigation be made of the quarters of the soldiers and of every other person at the fort. As a result it was found that every man was in his bunk, where all apparently had been asleep for several hours. The mystery has never been cleared up, so far as I know, to this day.

"However," continued Captain Hesse, "seven enlisted men were arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the lynching, and were taken to El Paso, 150 miles distant, in which town was located the nearest civil court at that time. There they were tried and acquitted.

LEE ORDERED DISBANDMENT.

"Col. Washington Seawell, who was the commanding officer of the fort, reported the affair to Colonel Lee, who was in command of the Department of Texas, with the result that an investigation was made in the manner prescribed by the Army Regulations. The inquiry, although rigid, failed to fasten the blame on any person, and at its conclusion Colonel Lee ordered the company to be disbanded and the members transferred to other companies to be discharged at the end of their enlistments without honor—that is, without the right to reenlist in the Army."

The precedents of the civil war cited as a justification for the discharge of the battalion at Brownsville seem to me, Mr. President, absolutely inapplicable to this case, and I quote likewise from Senate Document 155, page 312:

Memorandum furnished by The Military Secretary.

Members of Company A, First Eastern Shore Maryland Volunteers, mustered out of the service August 16, 1862 (presumably honorably discharged), because they refused to serve in Virginia.

Members of Company K, same regiment, were dishonorably discharged, without trial, July 2, 1863, for refusing to leave the section of the State in which it was claimed that they had enlisted to serve.

First Regiment, United States Reserve (Missouri Infantry), mustered out on account of the regiment being in a state bordering on mutiny on account of an alleged misunderstanding as to the terms of enlistment.

Company C, Fremont Body Guard, discharged on account of members refusing to be consolidated with any other organization of Missouri Volunteers.

Company G, Tenth New Jersey Infantry, because they refused to do duty as infantry, claiming that they were deceived into the belief that they were entering into the cavalry branch when enlisted.

These cases would seem sufficient to establish the conclusion that in no essential particular do they stand as a precedent for the action we are now considering in the case of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

PREVIOUS AFFRAYS.

It is true, Mr. President, that previous affrays to that at Brownsville have occurred in the Army, at posts garrisoned by both white and colored soldiers of the Regular Army, notably, the one referred to by the distinguished Senator from Idaho as occurring at Fort Sturgis, Dak. T., and, to again quote from Senate Document 155, pages 328, 329, 331, 541, and 542:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA,
Fort Snelling, Minn., November 10, 1885.

Respectfully returned to the Adjutant-General of the Army, through the headquarters of the Division of the Missouri.

The inclosed letter is, in the main, a just and temperate account of the occurrences at Sturgis City and Fort Meade, of which it speaks. I should take exception to but one of the statements which Mr. Caulfield makes. He states, as an ascertained fact, that "Doctor Lynch" was assassinated by a colored soldier. Doubtless he is fully convinced of the truth of this statement; but I submit that the inclosed copy of a report from Colonel Sturgis of the testimony given before the coroner's jury impaneled to determine the cause of Doctor Lynch's death, shows that while a case of grave suspicion was made out against the soldier, Hallon, the evidence was by no means conclusive. Of course since the brutal murder of Hallon by the mob of Sturgis City it has been impracticable to determine the question of his guilt or innocence. I inclose a copy of the proceedings of a board of officers convened by order of Colonel Sturgis to inquire into the facts connected with the killing of Bell. The conclusions of the board confirm the statements of Mr. Caulfield.

It is not probable that all the persons who were concerned in the murder of Bell will be detected and punished. Four men have been arrested, and if the evidence against them be sufficient to establish their guilt they will, without doubt, be confined and tried. In their cases the machinery of the law will act speedily.

I do not recommend the removal of the colored troops from Fort Meade. It is not alleged that they, as a body, have committed any crime or have been guilty of any disorder. Certain men belonging to one of the companies are accused of a most serious crime, but there is nothing to connect with it the other men of their company or any of the men of the other companies. There is no evidence to show that the peace of Sturgis City, in the future, is threatened by any of them. I do not believe that it is seriously threatened by them.

I have had much experience with colored troops, and I have always found them as well behaved and as amenable to discipline as any white troops that we have. The characteristic submissiveness of their race is manifested in the readiness with which they yield to military control.

They are much more temperate than our white troops, and crime and disorders resulting from intoxication are comparatively rare among them.

The situation at Fort Meade is an unfortunate one. It is very undesirable that a military post and a frontier town should stand in such close proximity to each other as Sturgis City and Fort Meade do; unfortunate possibly for the town, unquestionably unfortunate for the post. But the post was established before the town was founded, and I do not think that there would have been any town but for the post. Still the evils which result from this juxtaposition are not absolutely unavoidable.

The military authorities at the post will, I am sure, do their part to prevent the commission of crime, and if the civil authorities of the town will do theirs as well there will be no occasion whatever for apprehension.

I take it for granted that in the Territory of Dakota the keeping of houses of ill-fame is prohibited by law, but notwithstanding the law there are in the town two brothels which would appear to have been established for the express purpose of catering to the taste and pandering to the passions of the colored troops, for they are "stocked" with colored prostitutes—negresses and mulattoes.

They are, I am assured, places of the vilest character, and it was at one of them that the affray of September 19 occurred. Had no such place existed, it is most improbable that any affray would have occurred, and if the people of Sturgis City suffer such places to exist they must, I submit, expect the natural result of their existence—frequent broils, and from time to time the commission of the most serious crimes. And I submit further that until the people of the town shall have suppressed these dens, which equally debauch the troops of the post and threaten their own safety, they will not be in a position to ask the Government to change its garrison.

ALFRED H. TERRY,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

It is sad to say that the conditions as expressed in this communication of General Terry exist too much in connection with almost all our Army posts and in their immediate vicinity; and it is not out of place to say that such conditions existed in the immediate vicinity of Fort Brown and had existed there for a great many years, as the testimony and the records of investigation by your committee show.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether the Senator calls attention or not to the fact, which I think ought to be noted at that point in his speech, that the company to which the men belonged who participated in the shooting affray upon which he is commenting was not one of the three companies that were at Brownsville; and, in the second place, there was no trouble whatever to ascertain who the men were and identify the men who were guilty of participating in that shooting affray. Another thing which should be noted is that that happened twenty-five years ago.

Mr. BULKELEY. In 1885.

Mr. FORAKER. And with one exception, there is no man in that battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who was in the service and was in the battalion at that time.

Mr. BULKELEY. That was in 1885, as I have stated, and I am glad to have the Senator call my attention to the fact, because I wish to add that, in all the affrays that have occurred in the Army and in connection with colored troops in the Army, this particular battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry has never in the remotest way been connected with any of them.

I was about to read the indorsement of the War Department. This was during the Administration of a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of War, Mr. Endicott, and it is in reply to a letter addressed by a citizen of Dakota Territory, who had applied to have the troops removed.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 22, 1885.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 27th of September last commenting upon the outrages committed at the town of Sturgis, Dak. Ter., by colored soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, stationed at Fort Meade, and suggesting the removal of the colored troops to some other post and the substitution of white soldiers in their place, I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed copy of the report of Gen. A. H. Terry, commanding the Department of Dakota, to whom the matter was referred, and to say that both the Department and the Lieutenant-General of the Army concur in the views as expressed therein by General Terry.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. B. G. CAULFIELD,
Deadwood, Dak. T.

I want to say in this connection, because one of the charges against these men is a conspiracy of silence, that there was no difficulty at Fort Sturgis, where the affray to which I have alluded occurred, or at New Orleans, or where other affrays occurred, in obtaining the necessary evidence from their comrades, colored or white, when they believed them guilty of participation in any crime.

APPENDIX 5.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 4, 1906.

SIR: About six years ago Harry McDonald, a white United States soldier, of Fort St. Philip, La., while intoxicated, followed James Butler, a white citizen, at night to his home above Fort St. Philip and tried to force Butler to take him into his house. The latter refusing, McDonald shot and killed him. After McDonald's return to the fort, news of the homicide having spread, the latter was suspected, arrested, and searched; his revolver was carefully examined, its recent discharge discovered, and every soldier, from the commanding officer to the humblest private, united then and there and at the trial in ferreting out all the evidence in their power about this crime. The accused was convicted of murder, and is now in the Louisiana Penitentiary for life.

Again, about four years ago, at the same fort, Harry Morgan, a private in one of the United States Artillery companies, was charged with killing John H. McCloskey in a drunken brawl at night in one of the groggeries which cause so many similar crimes in this country. Though his fellow-soldiers, believing Morgan was not guilty of this crime, raised a fund for his defense, every soldier and employee at that fort volunteered all they knew, both before and at the trial on the witness stand, about this case. Morgan was acquitted by a jury of white citizens in Plaquemines Parish.

Once since then, in my official capacity, I tried and convicted United States soldiers of a lesser offense—assault and battery—committed above Fort Jackson, on the west bank of the Mississippi River, and again the white comrades in arms of the accused told the whole story of the trouble. Each of these cases occurred out of hearing of the forts, and but for the evidence of their brother soldiers, either then with the accused or who subsequently identified them with the crimes, there would have been a failure of justice.

In my own district twenty-two years ago, after a dispute over race precedence at a liquor bar at Dedrick Wischusen's store, in the parish of Plaquemines, Charles Campbell, a colored man, drew a pistol there and shot Theodore Tripkovich, a splendid type of an Austrian, dead. A jury, drawn by Republican commissioners, largely composed of colored men, to their eternal credit, sent Campbell to the scaffold for this crime, and he was hung.

The true friends of the colored people will teach them, as you are doing, that crimes can not be condoned or concealed by them without its reacting terribly on the race.

Respectfully,

JAMES WILKINSON,
District Attorney, Twenty-ninth Judicial District.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

These cases are all of record.

J. W.

This report of General Terry and its approval by Secretary Endicott, indicate the character of almost every affray in the Army whether by white or colored troops, for both classes are included as disclosed by Army records.

An effort has been made in accord with all these preliminary investigations, to construe the proceedings of the court and its rendered verdict, in the case of the court-martial of Major Penrose, commanding at Fort Brown on the night of the affray—and who was charged with "neglect of duty"—as a verdict rendered against the soldiers. I will ask here leave to insert without reading, the charges and specifications on which Major Penrose was both tried and acquitted, as taken from the records of the court (see pp. 4 and 1248):

[Extracts from proceedings of a general court-martial convened at Headquarters Department of Texas, San Antonio, Tex., February 4, 1907, in the case of Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry.]

(Page 4): The accused was then arraigned upon the following charge and specifications:

"CHARGE.—Neglect of duty, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in violation of the sixty-second article of war.

"Specification I.—In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, commanding the post of Fort Brown, Tex., after being on the morning of August 14, 1906, between 1 and 2 a. m., duly informed by the mayor of Brownsville, Tex., one Doctor Combe, that soldiers of his command had shot and killed one civilian of the city of Brownsville, Tex., and badly wounded a lieutenant of police of that city, did immediately thereafter and until daylight wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measures or action by prompt inspection of guns or pistols or otherwise, or any due exercise of discipline, to detect the men engaged in said attack and killing, or any of them, or to restrain or bring them to justice for said crime. This at Fort Brown, Tex., August 14, 1906.

"Specification II.—In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, being aware of the feeling of resentment in his command toward citizens of Brownsville, as a result of assaults upon certain individuals of the command, and having been notified by a Mr. Evans, of Brownsville, about 5 p. m. August 13, 1906, of an attack upon his wife by a soldier of the command, and knowing of the inflamed feeling existing in the town toward the soldiers as a result thereof, did nevertheless fail to give any orders to Capt. E. A. Macklin, Twenty-fifth Infantry, officer of the day, requiring special vigilance on his part or that of the guard or to make frequent inspections or any inspections during the night after 12 o'clock, and did wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measures or precautions to hold at the post the men of his command, or in any manner to watch, restrain, or discipline said men; by reason of which failure certain men of his command, to the number of about twelve or more, were enabled to assemble, and did assemble, armed with rifles, and did proceed to the town of Brownsville, Tex., and did then and there shoot and wound and kill certain citizens thereof. This at Fort Brown and Brownsville, Tex., August 13 and 14, 1906."

To which the accused pleaded as follows:

To the first specification, Not guilty.

To the second specification, Not guilty.

To the charge, Not guilty.

The judge-advocate here addressed the court as follows:

After a long investigation, covering weeks, the court was closed, and the accused, Major Penrose, was acquitted of the charge of neglect of duty, but found guilty under an amended specification, on which he had not been tried. The court, however, acquitted him, and the verdict of the court was approved by the department commander, as appears from the following extract from the record:

Page 1248:

* * *. The court was closed, and finds the accused, Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry—

"Of the first specification: 'Not guilty.'

"Of the second specification: 'Guilty, except the words "being aware of the feeling of resentment in his command toward citizens of Brownsville, as a result of assaults upon certain individuals of the command, and;" and the word "inflamed;" and the words "special vigilance on his part or that of the guard or to make;" and the words "and did wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measures or precautions to hold at the post the men of his command or in any manner to watch, restrain, or discipline said men, by reason of which failure;" substituting for the words "by reason of which failure" the words "after which;" and except the words "to the number of twelve or more were enabled to assemble and;" and of the excepted words "not guilty;" and of the substituted word "guilty.'

"So that the second specification, as amended, shall read as follows:

"'Specification II: In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, having been notified by a Mr. Evans, of Brownsville, about 5 p. m. August 13, 1906, of an attack upon his wife by a soldier of the command, and knowing of the feeling existing in the town toward the soldiers as a result thereof, did nevertheless fail to give any orders to Capt. E. A. Macklin, Twenty-fifth Infantry, officer of the day, requiring frequent inspections, or any inspections, during the night after 12 o'clock, after which certain men of his command did assemble, armed with rifles, and did proceed to the town of Brownsville, Tex., and did then and there shoot and wound and kill certain citizens thereof. This at Fort Brown and Brownsville, Tex., August 13 and 14, 1906. And the court attaches no criminality thereto on his part.'"

"Of the charge: "'Not guilty.'"

"And the court does therefore acquit him, Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry."

The judge-advocate was then recalled, and the court, at 7.05 p. m. adjourned sine die.

GEO. LE ROY BROWN,
Colonel Twenty-sixth Infantry, President.

CHAS. E. HAY, Jr.,
Captain, Acting Judge-Advocate, Judge-Advocate.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio, Tex., March 25, 1907.

In the foregoing case of Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, the proceedings, findings, and acquittal are approved.

WM. S. MCCASKEY,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Army, Commanding Department.

I submit, Mr. President, that the soldiers were neither directly nor indirectly parties to that trial; that they were never summoned nor appeared before the court, except possibly as witnesses, either in person or by counsel. I am not familiar with the powers or practice of a court-martial; but it looks strange to a layman that an indictment or, as in this case, charges and specifications, to which an accused officer has pleaded and submitted himself for trial can, after the evidence and arguments are concluded, be so amended and changed as to suit the whims of a court as to the character of the verdict they shall render. At all events, Major Penrose was acquitted of the charge of "neglect of duty," although found guilty under one of the amended specifications. If this finding can be construed as implicating the soldiers in this affray—that is, the acquittal of Major Penrose and a verdict of guilty against the soldiers—it might be likened, Mr. President, to frontier justice in the early days as some of us were accustomed to hear it, of the trial of an accused for murder and the conviction of his neighbor for horse stealing.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, and I will not do it if he has the slightest objection——

Mr. BULKELEY. I have no objection; it is a relief sometimes to be interrupted.

Mr. FORAKER. But it occurrrd to me that I ought to call attention there, for fear the Senator may not do it, to the fact that at the time when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] insisted that these soldiers had been court-martialed and found guilty they were not soldiers at all, for as a result of their discharge without honor they were not in the Army and were not subject to court-martial. That is not extraordinary, though, measured by other circumstances and features of this most extraordinary case. Trying a neighbor for horse stealing when he was not charged with anything is not a circumstance to what has been done here.

Mr. BULKELEY. Before leaving the discussion of this part of the case, Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senators that, at one period, November 18, 1906—and in this I shall be obliged to disagree for a moment with my distinguished friend from Ohio in some portion of his remarks—in a moment of inspiration it occurred to the Secretary of War that a possible injustice had been done to these soldiers, that the procedure which led up to the suspending of the order dismissing the soldiers of the battalion might have been irregular from the standpoint of law, practice, or precedent, or that new and further evidence might be produced. What I want to call the attention of Senators to is the fact that there was a time when the Secretary of War seemed to disagree with the President.

I will read the order of November 18, 1906, when, as perhaps you will all remember, the President was absent on a trip to view the great canal being constructed on the Isthmus. Together with that I will read another order, under date of November 20, 1906, directing the discharge of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry to continue, Senate Document No. 155, pages 187 and 189:

[Telegram.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 18, 1906.

The COMMANDING GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio, Tex.:

Secretary of War directs you suspend action under order for discharge men of Twenty-fifth Infantry until further orders from here. Telegraph acknowledgment of this.

AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

Two days later, however, for some cause not disclosed by the official record, he issued another order, directing the discharge to proceed.

[Telegram.]

THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 20, 1906.

COMMANDING GENERAL DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio:

Secretary War directs you proceed with discharge of members of Twenty-fifth Infantry as originally ordered. Telegraph acknowledgment receipt of this and subsequent action.

AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

I have been unable to obtain from the records or from the office of the Adjutant-General the correspondence or telegrams that passed between the President and the Secretary of War. Under date of April 25, 1908, I wrote the Adjutant-General, and received his reply, dated April 27, 1908, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, April 25, 1908.

Maj. Gen. F. C. AINSWORTH, United States Army,
Adjutant-General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: It is shown by the official documents in regard to the discharge of the colored soldiers at Brownsville, as contained in Senate Document No. 155, that on November 18, 1906, the Secretary of War issued an order suspending the execution of the order for the dismissal of these soldiers; that on the 20th of November, 1906, the record shows that the Secretary of War directed the immediate execution of the President's original order.

I fail to find anything in the official record relative to the reasons for the suspension, and later for the renewing of the President's order of dismissal. Are there any records, documents, or otherwise showing that the President directed the carrying out of the original order?

I understand that the President, at the time when the orders of the Secretary of War were issued, was either on a voyage to or at Panama. If there be any such communications addressed to or received from the President, or other records relating to the suspension of and later the renewing of the President's order of dismissal I would respectfully ask, if you can properly do so, that I be furnished with a copy of the same.

Yours, truly,

M. G. BULKELEY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 27, 1908.

Hon. M. G. BULKELEY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of the 25th instant relative to the suspension and subsequent renewal of the order for the discharge of certain colored soldiers, I beg leave to say that the printed record contains copies of absolutely all the documents relating to the matter that are on file in my office. Nothing has ever reached my office or come to my knowledge relative to the reasons for the suspension and subsequent renewal of the order for the discharge of these men.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Adjutant-General.

I am therefore compelled to rely upon the press reports of that period for the information which I have sought from the official records of the War Department. Of course I can not vouch entirely for their accuracy, but I find no record anywhere of the denial of their truthfulness. I ask that the article from the Washington Post of November 21, 1906, from which I quote, may be printed in full as a part of my remarks. It is the best record I can obtain of the reason for the suspension of the order of the President and its renewal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the article which the Senator is about to read from the Washington Post coincident with the order of the Secretary of War suspending proceedings against these soldiers?

Mr. BULKELEY. I will give the dates. The date of the suspension order is November 18; the date of its renewal November 20; and the article I quote is dated November 21, apparently written in view of all the circumstances which had transpired and which were transpiring during these two or three days.

[The Washington Post, November 21, 1906.]

TAFT'S BOLD STEP.

* * * * * * *

Is there danger that the suspension by Secretary Taft of the President's order dismissing the three colored companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, without honor, will cause friction between the President and the man who has been his chief lieutenant the past two years?

This is the question public men and Army officers are asking each other when they discuss this situation privately.

The situation is an embarrassing one for the President, whichever horn of the dilemma he may take. After reviewing the facts in this case, as submitted to him, the President issued the now famous order that put a whole battalion of men out of the service dishonorably, and then started for the Isthmus. Some comment has resulted because the order was not promulgated until after the election. The action of the President was supposed to be final, and if criticism followed it might be reasonably supposed that the incident in large measure would be forgotten before the President again reached Washington.

TAFT ASSUMES RESPONSIBILITY.

If this was the expectation, Secretary Taft succeeded admirably in reviving public interest and intensifying the criticism of the President's original order. Of course, the President could not be expected to know of the deluge of complaints and protests with which the Department was flooded after his departure, nor did he know that the New York Republican Club had condemned his action and called for fair play for these colored troops.

Secretary Taft did know these things, however, and he assumed the responsibility of suspending the Executive order until the President could be heard from. Now, with the matter afresh in the public mind, the President must add to the weight of these protests by compelling submission to his original order, if he overrides the Secretary, or admit that he may have acted hastily if he rescinds his order and reopens the case. Which he will do may be known to-day, by which time Secretary Taft hopes to be in communication with the President.

Meanwhile the War Secretary will say nothing. He refused yesterday to say more than "I can't discuss the case until to-morrow." This was interpreted to mean that the Secretary could say nothing until he had heard from the President and received his instructions. The Secretary also declined to say whether he had been in communication with the President by wireless.

CONFERS WITH OLIVER.

Secretary Taft arrived in Washington from New York yesterday afternoon and went at once to his office, where he summoned General Oliver, Assistant Secretary of War; Major-General Ainsworth, Military Secretary, and Brig. Gen. Thomas H. Barry, Chief of Staff, for a conference. This conference lasted more than an hour, and before it was concluded Mr. Loeb, Secretary to the President, also was summoned to the Department. Mr. Loeb was called into the conference presumably to give some information concerning the time when the President was expected to reach Porto Rico and the possibility of getting access to him over the cable, a much more satisfactory method of communication than by wireless.

It was suggested yesterday after the conference that Secretary Taft's reason for refusing to talk was his knowledge of the fact that the President would not rescind his order, and that it had been decided not to make this decision public until it was possible to accompany it with copies of the reports of Colonel Bixby and General Garlington. These reports have been in the hands of the Public Printer for several days, and it is expected that they will be ready for distribution to-day.

It is hoped by officials of the War Department that their publication will set at rest the agitation which the President's order has aroused, as they are regarded by the officials as showing clearly the necessity for the dismissal of the negro soldiers, and that the action taken by the President was the only thing that could be done under the circumstances.

This surmise, on the other hand, is discounted by the positive statement from a reliable source that officials here have not been in communication with the President since he left Colon, and that nothing has been heard from him on the subject of the dismissal of the troops.

DISPATCH FROM PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, however, had reached Gilchrist Stewart, of the Constitutional League, in New York City, in which the President declined to suspend his order discharging the colored troops unless the facts as known to him were shown to be false, but expressing his willingness to hear new facts bearing on that case.

Mr. Stewart cabled to President Roosevelt at Ancon, Panama, as follows:

"Republican county committee unanimously denounces discharge of colored soldiers. PARSONS, OLCOTT, BENNET, committee petitioning Department. Newspapers emphatic. Developments and new facts warrant. Ask immediate suspension order."

The President's reply contained the following:

"Unless facts as known to me are shown to be false, the order will under no circumstances be revoked, and I shall not for one moment consider suspending it on a simple allegation that there are new facts until these new facts are laid before me. Inform any persons having new facts to have them in shape to lay before me at once on my return, and I will then consider whether or not any further action by me is called for.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

NO WIRELESS COMMUNICATION.

At the Department yesterday, it was explained that the reason the President was able to reply to Mr. Stewart's cablegram, was that Mr. Stewart's inquiry was sent early Saturday and reached Colon before the cable office closed, while Secretary Taft's message was not sent until Saturday night, and doubtless missed the President. Since the Louisiana left Colon, both Secretary Taft and Secretary Loeb have been out of communication with the President, although repeated efforts have been made to pick up the ship by wireless. A message from the President, given out at the White House Monday, evidently was sent by regular telegraph from Colon and not by wireless from the Louisiana.

Pains were taken to show that Secretary Taft had not attempted to go over the head of the President in his absence, but had merely directed that the execution of the order be suspended. He has acquiesced in the delay in putting it into operation in order to afford the President an opportunity to reconsider if he wishes to do so.

Some Army officers contend that if the President had knowledge of the sentiment which his action has created and the criticism which it has caused, he might reopen the case and give the men affected an opportunity to defend themselves. Being out of the country, he has not had an opportunity to know how a large portion of the public regards the drastic course he took. Officials of the War Department contend, however, that the public will be thoroughly enlightened and approve the course of the President as soon as the report of General Garlington is published.

The War Department had no advices yesterday confirming the press dispatches from Fort Reno that twenty-five members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry already have been discharged under the original order. So far as the Department knows, it was said, only seven members of the battalion alleged to be responsible for the riot at Brownsville have been dismissed, and these were soldiers who were arrested at San Antonio and were dismissed from the service after the courts failed to substantiate charges that the men participated in the riot at Brownsville.

At this point I will end the discussion of that phase of the question, as to the propriety and the legality and the precedents for the dismissal of these troops, and I will talk for a few moments of Brownsville, its characteristics, and the surrounding country, and I shall quote during these remarks from no less authority than Texas citizens themselves and those who live in and are familiar, and have been for years, with that part of the country.

BROWNSVILLE AND ITS CHARACTERISTICS.

Fort Brown, Tex., is a military post established during the Mexican war, 1846, and is contiguous to the city of Brownsville, near the mouth of the Rio Grande River; it had a population in 1900 of 6,305, as given by the Bureau of the Census, whose authority I append:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, April 14, 1908.

Hon. MORGAN G. BULKELEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BULKELEY: In response to your telephonic request of to-day, I take pleasure in giving you below, the data specified in regard to Brownsville, Tex., with the exception of the number of naturalized citizens, which was not tabulated at the Twelfth Census for cities with less than 25,000 inhabitants:

Very respectfully,

W. S. ROSSITER, Acting Director.

It is, and always has been, necessarily a frontier post; it is separated from the business and residential portion of the city by a road, known as the Garrison road, and oftentimes called Fifteenth street; and it is in close proximity to this residential part that the affray occurred on the night of August 13–14, 1906. This post has been garrisoned since its establishment by both white and colored soldiers, commanded by distinguished and well-known officers of the Army, to the entire satisfaction of the citizens of Brownsville and without serious discrimination against the soldier, except that we find in the evidence that the police were more aggressive against the soldier for slight offenses, for the reason that the soldiers' fines, if inflicted, were always paid in cash. The Mexicans, if fined, were sent to the county jail or the workhouse.

Mr. HOPKINS. To work out the fine?

Mr. BULKELEY. To work out the fine. This is the testimony of Captain Kelly. He was a soldier of the civil war, in the Union army; settled at Brownsville at the close of the war, forty years ago and more; and is one of its most prominent and reputable citizens. He is president of a bank, and was the presiding officer of the investigating committee of the citizens of Brownsville immediately after this affray.

[Testimony of Captain Kelly, vol. 3, p. 2528.]

Q. Now, Captain, I will get you to state, during the entire time the Twenty-sixth was there, did you hear any complaints from the officers of any oppressive treatment whatever by the policemen of Brownsville against the soldiers?—A. I never heard an officer say so at all. I know there were two or three conflicts between drunken soldiers and Mexican policemen, and I have no doubt that the Mexican policemen when they got a man who was drunk did not treat him well.

Q. Whether he was a soldier or not?—A. Well, particularly if he were a soldier.

Q. Did not treat him well?—A. That is to say, I think they would strike a soldier harder and get him to the police station as fast as they could, for two reasons: First, when he was fined, he always managed to pay his fine. His comrades made it up. That appeared to be one of the reasons why they were very likely and very anxious to run a soldier in when they got a chance. I suppose there was some sort of divvy about the fines. I do not know that of my own knowledge. If they ran a Mexican in, he was simply sent to labor on the streets.

Q. He had no money to pay his fine?—A. No money to pay his fine.

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. What was the other reason?

Senator WARNER. He said one reason was that a soldier would pay his fine, and the other was that a Mexican did not.

These peaceful conditions seem to have been maintained in Brownsville, as between the citizens and the soldiers, up to the time of the order for the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry to occupy the post.

The maintenance of this post, for the protection of the city of Brownsville and its people, both from foreign invasion and from the lawless inhabitants in the surrounding territory, was insisted upon when the question of its abandonment was being considered by a board of Army officers in 1901; I will quote the strong and urgent reasons urged by officials and civilians alike for the retention of this and other posts on the Rio Grande frontier:

7. FORT BROWN, TEX.

* * * * * * *

[Telegram.]

DALLAS, TEX., October 2, 1901.

SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington, D. C.:

It is rumored that the Department contemplates abandoning Fort Brown, in this State. The importance of this post to effect the protection of the people of the lower Rio Grande frontier can not be overestimated, and I earnestly ask that the fort be maintained.

C. A. CULBERSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 10, 1901.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON, U. S. Seantor,
Dallas, Tex.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 2d instant, in which you remark that it is rumored that the abandonment of Fort Brown, Tex., is contemplated, and stating that the importance of this post for the protection of the people of the lower Rio Grande frontier can not be overestimated, and asking that the fort be maintained; and replying thereto to inform you that your request will receive due consideration.

Very respectfully,

H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant-General, Major-General, United States Army.

DALLAS, TEX, October 1, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have just learned with astonishment that the War Department is contemplating the abandonment of Fort Brown, at the mouth of the Rio Grande, on the Mexican frontier of Texas. I do not understand how such a step could meet with a moment's favorable consideration by anyone familiar with the situation and necessities of that frontier, for there is no more important post in all the military establishment of the country from a strategic point of view. It is at the mouth of the principal river of our western border, commanding 1,700 miles of exposed frontier liable at any time to require prompt and effective military aid. The recent development of railroad facilities has rendered its support comparatively cheap, and there is every reason why it should be retained and strengthened instead of being abandoned. The importance of that post was demonstrated in the civil war of 1861–1865, and its great utility for international defense is appreciated to the fullest by Mexico, as that Government maintains its chief garrison just across the river at Matamoros. I wish to protest most vigorously against the discontinuance of Fort Brown as wholly unwarranted and in the nature of a public calamity to the people of Texas, if not of the entire Union.

In speaking thus emphatically, I do not do so from hearsay, for I am entirely familiar with the situation there, as I have traversed the region along the Rio Grande and at its mouth, in the vicinity of Brownsville, many times, and am thoroughly acquainted with the conditions and possibilities of that frontier.

The details and facts connected with the post will be presented to you by others more directly interested locally, but in the name of the people of the whole State I desire to enter my most earnest objection and protest to the proposed action of the Department in abandoning this critical and important military establishment.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

DUDLEY G. WOOTEN.

SENATE CHAMBER,
Austin, Tex., October 3, 1901.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to herewith transmit you copy of senate concurrent resolution No. 8, passed by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Texas October 1, 1901.

With continued high regards, I have the honor to remain, sir,

Yours, obediently,

W. B. O'QUINN,
Secretary Senate, State of Texas.

It was thought of enough importance for the legislature of the State of Texas to pass a series of resolutions of the same character, which I will ask to have included as a part of my remarks.

Senate concurrent resolution 8.

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Texas legislature that the Federal Government contemplates the early abandonment of Fort Brown, located in the town of Brownsville, Tex.; and

Whereas the abandonment of said fort would mean the removal of one of the most important Federal posts on the Mexican frontier, it being at the mouth of the Rio Grande, and guarding the frontier for more than 140 miles; and

Whereas the town of Brownsville and the town of Matamoros are important to the commercial world, and especially the town of Brownsville, which receives a goodly amount of ocean traffic; and

Whereas the Mexican Government considers the town of Matamoros and country tributary thereto as of sufficient commercial, military strategic importance to justify said government in maintaining at the said town of Matamoros a strong military post: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That we do hereby protest against the contemplated action of the Federal Government, and most earnestly request of the President of the United States and the Secretary of War to continue said post and all other military posts on the Rio Grande.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress and the governor of this State be, and they are hereby, requested to take up this matter with the proper officials of the Federal Government and urge the continuation of the military post at Fort Brown; and

Resolved further, That the secretary of the senate be, and he is hereby, instructed to immediately mail a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the governor of this State.

THE STATE OF TEXAS, SENATE CHAMBER.

I, W. B. O'Quinn, secretary of the senate of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of senate concurrent resolution No. 8, as passed by the senate and house of representatives on October 1, 1901.

W. B. O'QUINN,
Secretary of the Senate.

I will also quote from a letter written by the governor of Texas:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Austin, Tex., October 4, 1901.

SIR: I beg to herewith inclose you a copy of a resolution adopted by the legislature of Texas in reference to the contemplated abandonment of Fort Brown, and to earnestly request that the post be maintained. It is quite important that troops be held at the mouth of the Rio Grande River, in order to insure peace and order on that portion of our frontier. In my judgment, its location is such as makes it of exceeding importance, and I earnestly trust that the Department will retain it at its present strength.

I have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Governor of Texas.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Beaumont, Tex., November 20, 1901.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A resolution of the Texas legislature protesting against the abandonment of Fort Brown, near Brownsville, Tex., has been forwarded to you. I beg hereby to join in this protest, and respectfully request that this fort be continued.

Very respectfully,

S. B. COOPER,
Member Congress, Texas.

HUNTSVILLE, TEX., October 5, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our people are very much stirred up over the prospective abandonment of Fort Brown as a military post.

Permit me to earnestly urge upon you the propriety of continuing the protection of the Rio Grande section by maintaining this fort.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. H. BALL, M. C.

SHERMAN, TEX., October 4, 1901.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: It has been called to my attention that the War Department has been contemplating the abandonment of Fort Brown, at Brownsville, Tex.

As one of the Representatives from Texas, feeling a deep interest in the welfare of her people, and being well aware of the exposure and difficulties our people on the Mexican border have been subjected to, I most earnestly urge the increase of the frontier protection, the continuance of Fort Brown, and the location of adequate military forces along the Rio Grande border to insure protection of American interests. I would respectfully suggest that the maintenance of forts and military garrisons along the Rio Grande would not be attended with any extraordinary expense, and that no part of the frontier of the United States is more in need of a constant, watchful guard than that bordering on the Republic of Mexico. I trust that a consideration of this matter will result in an increase, and not in a decrease of this protection. Although located myself in the northern part of Texas, I feel that the interests of the southwestern portion of the State, which is developing so rapidly, should not be discouraged, nor should American interests be allowed to suffer for want of adequate protection.

Very respectfully,

C. B. RANDELL, M. C.,
Fifth District of Texas.

GONZALES, October 7, 1901.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: My information is that your Department contemplates the abandonment of Fort Brown, at Brownsville, Tex., and I write you to earnestly protest against this action. I trust you will pardon me for saying that, in my judgment, a throrough investigation will convince you that such action will be both unwise and unjust. It is true that now our relations with Mexico are extremely friendly, on account of which we all rejoice; still, the situation is such that the maintenance of the fort will be an aid to continued security, and prevent any uprising of lawlessness along the border, which is so far from the seat of government of both countries.

From letters and telegrams I have received, it is evident that the people of the State in that section are much stirred up, and great dissatisfaction will result from the abandonment of the fort.

Doubtless my colleague, the Hon. Rud. Kleberg, who is now in Washington, will interview you in the matter. I heartily join him in his efforts in this matter.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. F. BURGESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., October 26, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to submit for your consideration the telegram I received some time ago, during your absence from the city, with reference to Fort Brown, at Brownsville, Tex., of which I spoke to you to-day. The gentlemen signing the message are all prominent citizens, and their statements are perfectly reliable. I trust that Fort Brown and the posts along the Rio Grande generally may be maintained, as I believe they are necessary both as strategic points as well as necessary protection against marauding bands on the border between the United States and the Republic of Mexico.

Very respectfully,

RUDOLPH KLEBERG,
Member of Congress.

I have quoted all these letters, or portions of them, not to show the character of the population of Brownsville but to show the character of the population that lives in the surrounding territory on both banks of the Rio Grande, both in Mexico and in the United States, and the opinion of the people of Texas themselves as to the necessity not only of protection from across the river, but from the lawless people who occupy this territory.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Connecticut, I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to know whether it developed in the course of the hearing that the Mexicans came freely to Brownsville, the Mexican soldiers mingling with the American soldiers. Did that develop in the hearing?

Mr. BULKELEY. There is abundant testimony as to that. There was a ferry running in close proximity to Fort Brown, and it was a constant matter of visit from one place to the other by the soldiers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did it develop at all that the Mexicans came over at any time and rioted in the city of Brownsville?

Mr. BULKELEY. If the Senator will listen to the letter which I am going to read, I think he will be convinced that at one time the city of Brownsville had been in the hands of the lawless people who inhabit this territory for two or three days at a time, when it was almost impossible to secure help, and they even had to call on the Mexican Government to protect Brownsville.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I noticed in your statement a moment ago that the governor of Texas and other public men felt that this garrison should be strengthened. Of course that was not from fear of war, but probably from fear of rioting.

Mr. BULKELEY. It was merely for the protection of the people against raids from the other side and their own side of the river. I think the next letter will disclose the point.

Mr. FORAKER. "Marauding bands" is the expression.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. "Marauding bands?"

Mr. FORAKER. That is the expression employed by one of the petitioners for the post to be continued—in order to protect the citizens of Brownsville against the marauding bands.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut what is the color of the uniform of the Mexican soldiers.

Mr. BULKELEY. I do not think it is in the testimony, and I do not know that I can give it. But I shall not make any charge against the Mexican soldiers as marauders in this town. I have another theory which I will develop later. I do not think there is any occasion to lay this raid to Mexican soldiers.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is not material from your standpoint.

Mr. BULKELEY. I do not think there is any charge on the part of anybody against them, whatever their uniforms were. Some questions have been raised in regard to the character of the guns they used, and whether it was possible that the ammunition used in United States arms could be used in Mexican guns. But I do not recollect that any question was raised.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BULKELEY. Possibly the Senator from Ohio can state.

Mr. FORAKER. My recollection is there is some testimony on that point; that the uniform of the Mexican soldiers is somewhat like ours, though not exactly the same shade of light color. There is a difference of shade. That is my recollection as to what the testimony is. As the Senator from Connecticut proceeds, I will try to find out.

Mr. BULKELEY. The letter I am about to read——

Mr. FORAKER. I want to join with the Senator in this connection in saying that no one means to suggest that this was done by Mexican soldiers. All I understand that the Senator is undertaking to do here is to show by these statements from Texas citizens as to why a garrison should be continued at Brownsville, that the people at that point needed the protection of a garrison as against the marauding bands which infested that locality. That was their own expression. That is the reason why I used it.

Mr. BULKELEY. I am about to read a letter from a member of the Texas legislature, written at that time. The question which was being considered by a board of Army officers was the abandonment of undesirable and unnecessary Army posts, and Fort Brown was among the number. They were not confined to the frontier. They were all under consideration. It was a lengthy hearing. This [exhibiting] is only one volume of the report, and these letters that I am quoting from are all contained in this volume.

Mr. FORAKER. It was in 1901.

Mr. BULKELEY. 1901. I will read this letter, to which I invite the attention of Senators who have made inquiries of me.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the date?

Mr. BULKELEY. December 2, 1901, written to the board of Army officers making the examination.

RIO GRANDE CITY, TEX.,
December 2, 1901.

Lieut. Gen. NELSON A. MILES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

Now, if a party of bandits, cattle thieves, or revolutionists cross from Mexico—and the river is no obstacle—the first thing they would do would be to cut the wire, and then they would have full sweep for a week or ten days, until word could be gotten to Laredo and troops sent on the long march here. We could doubtless oppose some resistance, especially to a small party, but remember that this frontier is inhabited almost entirely by Mexicans, few of whom, in the case of revolutionists coming over, would be inclined to take part with us, and some might even actively assist the revolutionists. Starr County (in which Fort Ringgold is situated) contains over 11,000 people, and of these less than 100 are Americans and negroes. The proportions are about the same in the adjoining counties of Zapata and Hidalgo, though in Cameron County (the site of Fort Brown) the proportion of Americans is slightly larger. All this was shown clearly at the time of the "Garza revolution" in 1891, when several troops of cavalry and companies of infantry of our Army, aided by State rangers and deputy sheriffs, found themselves for a long time unable to capture these few revolutionists on account of the nature of the country and the sympathy of many of the people with their cause. The history of Mexico shows that many of the revolutions that have distracted that country had their origin and found their strongest support on both sides of this frontier. I am informed that President Diaz himself started his revolution at, and was equipped from, Brownsville. If our neutrality laws and our obligations to a friendly nation are to be observed, troops must be maintained at one or two points between Laredo and the mouth of the Rio Grande, to cut off in the bud incipient revolutions starting up here.

I think that the time of the great cattle raids is over, but a period of disturbance, to be feared upon the death of Mexico's strong ruler, might cause their renewal. They were common on this frontier up to a few years ago. In 1859 the War Department withdrew all troops from the lower Rio Grande posts, and the consequence was the great Cortina raid from Mexico, when the robber general Cortina seized the city of Brownsville, killed the chief of police and a few other citizens, and held a carnival of robbery, outrage, and crime, until, at our urgent solicitation, the Mexican authorities of Matamoros sent over a company or two of troops to protect our people, and moved the rest of the regiment down to the river bank, ready to cross if needed. The War Department did what it could to remedy the original mistake, and hurried troops down (under command of Col. Robert E. Lee, if I remember aright), but the march was long, and they would not have arrived in time to prevent a general massacre but for the timely and illegal action of the Mexican authorities. That, sir, was a time—

And I wish Senators would pay particular attention, because this is from a Texas citizen—

That, sir, was a time not only of danger, but of abasement to our people, when they saw their town in possession of robbers, the American flag at the post filthily dishonored, their Government helpless to aid them, and the preservation of their lives and the honor of their women due only to the kindly but humiliating assistance of a friendly nation. Nor was it an easy task for our troops to overcome this band of robbers. The campaign lasted two or three months, and was conducted all up and down the river with varying fortunes, including one most inglorious defeat, before they were driven back crushed into Mexico. The archives of the War Department must contain a full account of this great raid, as well as of the many smaller ones, both before and since, that have plagued our people and demonstrated the usefulness of a standing army in time of peace.

As to riots and uprisings originating on this side of the river, they are no longer to be expected. Yet we can not forget the great riot here in 1888, when only the presence of the troops prevented a massacre. It will be remembered that on that occasion the wire was cut by the rioters (fortunately, just too late) and the town was in their hands, but Colonel Clendenning got out his Gatling guns, turned out his troops, and with a strong hand protected the refugees from the mob until the arrival of State Rangers and deputies from other counties restored order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who signed that letter?

Mr. BULKELEY. It was addressed to General Miles, and is signed by G. W. Seabury, representing the eighty-fifth legislative district.

But, apart from what the troops accomplish by their actions, their mere presence holds in check the lawless element always to be found on frontiers, and has been of the utmost value to this section and the country in general. Local protection is generally to be expected from local sources, but we stand here to protect not only ourselves, but the whole interior, from the lawlessness and crime of refugees from Mexican justice. As we suffer so much for the country, I think it not unreasonable for the country to aid us through United States troops and State Rangers.

I do not deny that the expense of these posts is great, but they are worth to the country at large vastly more than the amount expended on them. If there were no people here to protect, the enforcement of our laws and obligations of neutrality alone, not to speak of international complications, would imperatively demand their retention. * * *

Very truly, yours,

G. W. SEABURY,
Representative, Eighty-fifth Legislative District.

RIO GRANDE CITY, TEX., December 5, 1901.

President THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I understand that the United States troops are to be removed from the Texas frontier posts, Forts Ringgold and Brown. I trust I may be pardoned if I say that in the opinion of all here it would be a most unwise and detrimental move for the peace and quiet of the frontier, keeping the resident population in a constant state of fear and unrest, besides retarding progress in the way of immigration, which is just now for the first time beginning to come this way. We are now having peace, quiet, and progress from the fact that the United States troops are present, and it is only the knowledge of that fact that keeps the turbulent element (mostly Mexicans) down, saving us from raids, robberies, and loss of life. I know whereof I write, having lived on the frontier for over fifty-two years, having knowledge of and have experienced much of it. I will call your attention to the Cortina raid in 1859, just after the removal of the troops. In 1888 the presence of the garrison, during the Garsa-Seebre trouble, saved the lives and property of the Americans here, when if the Mexicans could have reached Seebre and Dillard, the two Americans connected with the affair, they would not have stayed their hands until every American in the place had been killed; but the two named above fled to the post for security, thus saving themselves and other American citizens. Also, during the Spanish-American war in 1898, we were threatened by raids ostensibly gotten up by Spaniards in Mexico, under the pretense of patriotism, but in reality for the purpose of plunder, only the presence of United States troops keeping them in abeyance.

Our position here is none too secure, conditions now being the same as ever. We hope and trust this step will be well considered in the interest of the law-abiding citizens and the Texas frontier.

AN AMERICAN CITIZEN.

Mr. PILES. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether these riots he speaks of were participated in by Mexican soldiers, according to the showing he has made?

Mr. BULKELEY. No. In that case the Mexican soldiers came across the river and helped to drive out the band of robbers who had Brownsville in their possession.

Mr. PILES. In the riots spoken of in this letter, were the participants confined altogether to members of robber bands?

Mr. BULKELEY. I think so; and cattle thieves.

Mr. PILES. Mexican cattle thieves?

Mr. NELSON. Revolutionists.

Mr. BULKELEY. Revolutionists who inhabited this territory.

Mr. PILES. As to any of the riots referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, I will ask if there is any showing that the participants shot up private houses in Brownsville, or whether it was confined to riots in the streets or even to raids on mercantile establishments and saloons. I wish to know whether any of the riots were carried so far as to make assaults on private residences?

Mr. BULKELEY. I have read all of the extracts that seemed to me pertinent. The town of Brownsville was for two or three days on one occasion in possession of these robbers, and that I thought should be distinctly understood. The robbers, not soldiers, took possession of the Government post and pulled down and trailed in the dirt the American flag; and it was not until the Mexican soldiers were appealed to to come and rescue the city from this lawless element that Mexican soldiers were sent over and finally drove them out before United States troops could reach the point.

I have quoted thus freely from these appeals from the people of the Texas frontier, in order to call attention to the character of the population and the dangers arising to the settled communities from the outlaws from both sides of the Rio Grande and contiguous to these communities. I regard these facts as important in view of previous raids into the settled towns as alluded to in the correspondence, and also in view of what we find more than once in the evidence before your committee, that on the night of the raid at Brownsville and shortly before the firing commenced, a party of horsemen, greater or less in number, were heard rapidly riding over the county road but a short distance outside the reservation and directly connecting with the Garrison road, or Fifteenth street, where the firing shortly after commenced.

I have in my remarks various affidavits and statements of the few persons and soldiers who were awake at the time the affray commenced. I will quote:

[S. Doc. No. 155, p. 512.]

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one William Harden, a private of Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says, as follows:

"I was in the post hospital at Fort Brown, Tex., asleep on my bunk, on the night of August 13, 1906, when the shooting took place at that post. The shooting woke me up. I got up and came out on the front porch toward town with the hospital steward and the other patients. When I got out on the hospital porch I heard a bunch of mounted people galloping along the wire fence from east to west along the north boundary of the post. They were coming from the northeast corner of the wire fence. They opened up a fire near where the wire fence joins the wall, in rear of the first set of barracks.

That was in the neighborhood of this county road.

"They fired a few shots here, I don't know exactly how many, and then rode on along the wall to where most of the firing took place—in rear of B and C Company barracks. Firing ceased soon after call to arms sounded. Some six or seven bullets came over the hospital. We got behind those big brick pillars. The bullets were lead bullets, because they had a coarse hum and did not sing like a steel bullet. It was too dark to see any persons. I knew nothing about any trouble.

"And further the deponent saith not.

"WILLIAM HARDEN,
"Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry."

Sworn to and subscribed before me, at Fort Reno, Okla., this 25th day of September, 1906.

SAMUEL P. LYON,
Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Summary Court.

[Testimony of William Harden, pp. 598–599.]

Q. That is the roadway inside of the reservation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There is a roadway outside of the reservation?—A. Yes, sir; there is a roadway outside. I heard these two rapid shots that way, outside, eastward from the hospital, and I jumps up and runs out on the porch, and I meets Nolan and Sanborn, and when I got out on the porch I heard a crowd of horses galloping; when I got out they had got pretty near the corner and had gotten about the corner of that fence. They had got about where the barbed-wire fence connected with the wall, and they opened up some shots, and then they galloped on down to the main gate and opened up—I don't know how many shots—I guess a hundred or more shots were fired there. Sanborn, being a first-class private in charge, he made myself and Nolan get behind the pillars in the old hospital building there. That is an old Spanish building, a big old building, and we got behind those pillars to keep from getting hit with stray bullets coming from the southeast over the hospital. He made us get behind there to keep from getting hit. And these was lead bullets.

Q. How many did you hear?—A. I heard some seven or eight bullets go over the hospital.

Q. What else did you hear that you can tell us about?—A. After he made us get behind these brick abutments, the call to arms went, and about three or four minutes after the call to arms went firing ceased. And the last shot that was fired was fired away downtown. It was an old musket or shotgun of some kind, fired away downtown. We all had formed on the porch there, and had talked there and wondered about the shooting, and he made us patients go to bed.

Pages 601–602:

Q. I think we understand that. Now, you got out (without going over all this), and you heard these horsemen galloping by?—A. When I got out I heard these horses galloping just before the road turns to go down to the barracks.

Q. You have been in the service how long?—A. Since 1905, the last time.

Q. How long before that?—A. I went out on a short-order furlough at Fort Logan. I went out in 1903 and I was out until 1905, when I reenlisted.

Q. From the sound of these men galloping by, how many men were there?—A. As nigh as I can get at it from my knowledge, I guess there was from twelve to fifteen. You know this—if I may ask the Senator a question.

* * * * * * *

Q. How do you know how many horsemen there were?—A. I don't know. I said from my knowledge it might have been twelve or fifteen horses.

Q. They were making no noise, of course?—A. They were making a lot of noise.

Q. They were not trying to keep it secret, at all? Are you certain they were making a noise?—A. They were galloping. I heard their hoofs against the ground, of course.

Q. Were the riders making any noise?—A. No, sir; the riders were not making any noise; only I heard their galloping.

Q. There was no hollering?—A. No, sir; no hollering.

Q. No shouting?—A. What is that?

Q. No shouting by the men on horseback?—A. No, sir; the men couldn't shout on horseback unless they were hollering.

Q. When the men were galloping, the firing was right toward the hospital?—A. Yes; but wait a minute.

Q. Yes; I will.—A. When the first shot was fired the horses galloped around, and when they got to the joining of the wall they opened up a fire again, and then when they got down to the gate then all this firing commenced. That is when the man made me and the other men get down behind the brick abutments.

[Testimony of Samuel Wheeler, pp. 642–643–645.]

Q. What was the conversation you had with General Garlington?—A. He asked me about the knowledge I had of this shooting.

Q. You told him?—A. Yes, sir; I told him, and when he explained it to me, then I went on to tell him that I thought that the people of Brownsville did this shooting, myself, and he said "Never mind about that; just answer such questions as are asked of you." So I quit. I was a soldier, and subject to orders, and didn't wish to give the General any insubordination; and so he said that would do.

Q. He asked you to tell all you knew of this shooting?—A. No, sir; he did not ask me to tell all I knew about the shooting.

Q. Did you understand that he wanted you to tell all you knew about it?—A. I might have.

Q. Were you ready to tell all you knew about it?—A. I have tried to always.

Q. Were you ready to tell all you knew if he had asked you to tell all you knew?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he ask you to tell him about hearing those horses galloping by?—A. I hadn't gotten to that point.

Q. He never refused to let you tell him about that?—A. I was telling him about the shooting. I didn't know whether the horses had anything to do with the shooting; only I knew I heard some horses going very rapidly.

Q. Was that a horse or some horses?—A. I said "horses" in the first beginning, I think, sir. It wasn't one horse, I am sure.

Q. How many horses?

Senator FORAKER. He said three or four horses.

Senator WARNER. I did not hear the three or four. I did not hear the witness say that.

By Senator WARNER:

Q. Just approximate, as near as you can, how many horses you heard.—A. Well, sir, it seemed to me it might have been about four horses—three or four horses. I didn't see them; I only heard them.

* * * * * * *

Q. Then when you heard those horsemen going that way, the fusillade was over?—A. No, sir; that was during the fusillade, during the shooting, sir. That was right along during the shooting. It seemed as though he must have had an awful gun. I could hear the reports from it, it seemed like a mile, down through the town.

Q. But confining it to this other point, now, as to those horses galloping, when was that, in reference to the fusillade you heard?—A. Right along the latter part of it.

Q. So that if there was anyone upon those horses, they could have had nothing to do with the fusillade down in the direction of Elizabeth street?—A. They could have had a good deal to do with it. It might have been another party down there. They could have connected with it.

Q. Yes; another body. But that body you heard up there going out Adams street——A. I didn't say they were going out Adams street. I don't know what street they were going out.

* * * * * * *

Q. Well, whether one or more; did you think at the time that that had nothing to do with the shooting, and therefore did not make the statement?—A. That the horses passing by at that time——

Q. Yes; had nothing to do with the shooting?—A. Had nothing to do with the shooting.

Q. No, sir?—A. No, sir; I don't believe any horses would travel with that force that those horses were traveling with, unless something was forcing them along. It is not usual for horses to travel with the force that these horses were traveling with without somebody is driving them. The horses seemed to be traveling with great speed.

Q. And you thought those horses were mounted, then?—A. I thought they must have been mounted by some one, and the ones they were mounted by must have been connected with this shooting.

It was also in evidence before your committee (see testimony of custom officers and others) of the desperate encounters with smugglers and criminals; that this adjacent territory was infested with bandits and robbers, as well as deserters from the Army. One customs officer—and he is the one that committed the assault upon the soldier Newton—testified that during his term of service he had made more than 600 arrests. With this admitted criminal population constantly under the surveillance of the officers of the law, would it be, Mr. President, a wild stretch of one's imagination to locate, with reason, the so-called "conspiracy" to raid the city of Brownsville, and in connection with the lawless element located there to seek vengeance on the officers of the law, both local and national, who had so often brought them within the clutches of justice? And if, in their murderous raids against officials, they should disregard, endanger, or take the lives of unoffending citizens it would not be an unnatural conclusion.

Brownsville itself is essentially a town of Mexican characteristics; its population is largely of Mexicans or of Mexican or Spanish descent, and the predominating language used by all is the Spanish. Its police force is composed of Mexicans, who speak the English language indifferently or not at all. Its streets are poorly lighted, as was stated by the President in one of his messages, from which I quote:

> The streets are poorly lighted, and the night was very dark.

This statement is fully corroborated by Major Penrose and every one of his officers, who repeatedly testified—and their testimony is uncontradicted—that it was impossible in the open grounds of the post to distinguish or identify their own men, on account of the darkness, at a greater distance than from 5 to 10 feet.

On the map furnished by the Government as an exhibit and appended to Senate document 155 (the little map, which Senators will find on their desks, is a reduction of this map) the lights of the city are clearly indicated. I shall be glad to have Senators examine it, if they choose, for their own information.

Reference to this map furnished by the Government as an exhibit (S. Doc. No. 166), on which the street lamps are indicated, shows conclusively that on the route covered by the raid there were but four city lamps, including Elizabeth street; and on Garrison road, or Fifteenth street, extending the whole front of the reservation, not a single lamp is located, and the only light this whole distance on this road was a single lamp at the post gate used by pedestrians. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] is mistaken when he locates two lamps over the main gate, as examination of photo Exhibit No. 5 clearly shows—as well as the testimony of Major Penrose on this point—that on Cowen alley, the location of the principal part of the shooting, there is not a single lamp, public or private, its entire length from Fifteenth street to Twelfth, and on Thirteenth street—the route taken by the raiders—there is a lamp located at the corner of Elizabeth, also one at the corner of Washington street, 300 feet apart.

Hearings, volume 3, pages 3021–3022:

By Senator BULKELEY:

Q. Where was the light at the gate?—A. Right on one of the posts, the post on the east side of the gate. There is a small gate. There is a large gate to the wagon road, and there is a small gate to the footpath, and it was on the post, or I think there was an iron rod that went over the gate, and it was suspended from that. I think that shows in one of the pictures.

Q. There was only one lamp there?—A. Only one lamp.

Q. And that was over the pedestrian gate?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator BULKELEY. Not three lights.

* * * * * * *

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. I show you the picture in the Purdy report.—A. No. 5.

Q. Does that correctly represent the lamp over the little gate?—A. Yes, sir; I think that lamp is right there. There is no lamp beyond that at all.

Q. There were no lamps that night over the big gatepost?—A. No, sir; there was no light over the big post. I don't think they are fixed for lights at all.

On Cowen alley, where the principal part of the shooting took place, there is not a single lamp, public or private, its entire length—from Fifteenth street to Twelfth—and on Thirteenth street, the route taken by the raiders, there is a lamp at the corner of Elizabeth; also one at the corner of Washington street. The lamps are 300 feet apart, and they are kerosene lamps of 8 candlepower only, as testified to by Lieutenant Leckie, who was sent to Brownsville for the purpose of an investigation of all the surroundings. Among other things, he investigated the location and the character of the lamps and their candlepower. All Senators know for themselves the amount of light furnished by an 8-candlepower kerosene lamp on a public street well shaded with trees.

Q. It has been suggested here by a question, I don't know whether you know or not, that the fort has been dismantled since, that it had been dismantled when these pictures were taken, and perhaps the lamps that had been over the post at the big gate had been removed. Have you a recollection whether there were any lamps over the post?—A. I think not, sir.

Q. Just the one lamp?—A. I think there was just that one lamp lighted.

Cowen alley is midway between these two lamps and about 120 feet from either. It is testified to by an Army officer that these lights are of but limited candlepower and that their reflection radius does not extend beyond a distance of 20 feet, which, taken in connection with the fact (see testimony of Mayor Combe) that these streets are fairly well covered with shade trees, would indicate that these few lights, located as I have indicated, would furnish little, if any, help in the identification of the raiders by people aroused from their slumbers at midnight looking out into the oblivion of midnight darkness. Major Blocksom, page 427, Senate Document No. 155, said:

None of the individual raiders were recognized. Streets are poorly lighted, and it was a dark night. Those who saw them were busy trying to keep out of sight themselves.

These quotations, with the map exhibits of the street lighting, I believe to be unquestionable, and there is little, if any, conflict of testimony as to the darkness of the night, so that it seems unnecessary to quote further from the testimony to establish these points.

The soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were not welcome as a garrison for Fort Brown. Soon after the order was issued for their location at that post a remonstrance against such action was forwarded to the War Department. (See S. Doc. No. 155, p. 301.)

[Extract from the Annual Report of the Secretary of War for the year 1906.]

DISCIPLINE—THE BROWNSVILLE AFFRAY.

I am very sorry to record a most serious breach of discipline and the commission of a heinous crime by certain members of a battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, Companies B, C, and D, on the night of the 13th and the morning of the 14th of August, at Fort Brown, Brownsville, Tex.

In June last objection was made to the stationing of this battalion at Fort Brown by a resident of Brownsville in a letter transmitted through Senator CULBERSON, to which the following answer was made:

It is proper to state at this point that the citizen of Brownsville who wrote this letter which was forwarded to the War Department and who had testified before your committee criticised one of the citizens of Brownsville in a public speech in the city, and the next morning he was ruthlessly shot on the streets of Brownsville by the son of the witness, showing that there is not an entire regard even in the city of Brownsville for the lives of their own white citizens.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 4, 1906.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your note of June 1, transmitting a letter from Mr. Sam P. Wreford, of Brownsville, Tex., stating certain objections to the stationing of negro troops at Fort Brown, and in reply to say that the matter of possible objections of this character was very carefully considered before the order was made, and I regret that I can not see my way clear to rescind it.

The fact is that a certain amount of race prejudice between white and black seems to have become almost universal throughout the country, and no matter where colored troops are sent there are always some who make objections to their coming. It is a fact, however, as shown by our records, that colored troops are quite as well disciplined and behaved as the average of other troops, and it does not seem logical to anticipate any greater trouble from them than from the rest. Friction occasionally arises with intemperate soldiers wherever they are stationed, but the records of the Army also tend to show that white soldiers average a greater degree of intemperance than colored ones. It has sometimes happened that communities which objected to the coming of colored soldiers have, on account of their good conduct, entirely changed their view and commended their good behavior to the War Department.

A change of station was necessary for these colored troops, and one-third of the regiment (a battalion) had already been sent to Fort Bliss, Tex., more than six months ago. Since that time no complaint concerning their conduct has reached the War Department, so far as I know. It was also necessary to send the entire regiment to the same locality, and to have sent it anywhere else would have involved two moves for the battalion now at Fort Bliss within about six months. This would have been an injustice to the troops concerned, and would, in addition, have entailed considerable extra expense upon the Government.

Trusting this explanation may be satisfactory to your constituents, I remain,

Very truly, yours,
WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

The battalion was accordingly sent to Fort Brown in command of Maj. C. W. Penrose, and arrived there July 28, 1906. Soon after its arrival unfortunate differences arose between the enlisted men and some townspeople. As is usual in such cases, there was contradictory evidence as to the cause for the troubles, though they were doubtless due primarily to the resentment of certain of the townspeople at the proximity of a negro battalion. The instances of friction were numerous and notorious enough to be the cause of much discussion in the barrack rooms of the three companies. The feeling of the enlisted men was also aroused by a discrimination insisted on in most of the saloons of the town, in which separate bars were provided for them. No serious injury was done to any of the colored soldiers, although one of them was knocked down by a Government official named Tate with a clubbed revolver for jostling his wife, as he charged, and another was pushed off a gang plank by a customs inspector into the mud of the Rio Grande, because drunk and disorderly, as it was claimed.

Under date of August 17, the following telegram was addressed to the Secretary of War (S. Doc. No. 155, p. 23):

[Telegram.]

DALLAS, TEX., August 17, 1906.

SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington D. C.:

Some time ago I called your attention to the danger of locating negro troops in Texas, especially at Brownsville. The recent outrageous conduct of such troops there fully justifies the fact of the people of that locality. Can not these troops be removed at once?

C. A. CULBERSON.

Lieut. Harry S. Grier (S. Doc. No. 155, pp. 115–116):

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you hear any of the people of Brownsville make any remarks about the colored soldiers?—A. I did.

Q. What did they say?—A. The very first day on our arrival in Brownsville I registered at the Miller Hotel, and in conversation with the clerk in regard to colored troops being sent to Texas he stated that the people were much opposed to their coming, and they mustn't take any undue liberties or there would be trouble.

Q. Do you know his name?—A. I do not, except he is night clerk in the Miller Hotel. On several occasions I have heard people explaining, not in a resentful way, what was customary for the colored people to do in that part of Texas, especially about drinking in bar with white men.

Q. Did you ever see any soldiers mistreated in Brownsville?—A. No, sir; I did not.

* * * * * * *

Major Blocksom reports, August 20, 1906 (S. Doc. No. 155, p. 71):

BROWNSVILLE, TEX.,
August 20, 1906.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.:

Causes of disturbance are racial. People did not desire colored troops here, and showed they thought them inferior socially by certain slights and denial of privileges at public bars, etc.

* * * * * * *

Page 65, under date of August 29:

* * * * * * *

I met many sterling people in Brownsville. The majority of good business men recognize the proper ethics of the situation, but many others of a somewhat lower class think the colored soldier should be treated like the negro laborer of the South. It must be confessed the colored soldier is much more aggressive in his attitude on the social equality question than he used to be.

Very respectfully,
A. P. BLOCKSOM,
Major, Inspector-General.

McCaskey, brigadier-general, commanding Southwestern Division and Department of Texas, August 17, 1906 (S. Doc. No. 155, p. 24):

[Telegram.]

CAMP MABRY, Austin, Tex., August 17, 1906.

MILITARY SECRETARY,
War Department, Washington, D. C.:

Unsatisfactory conditions at Fort Brown and Brownsville continue. Citizens appeal to State officials, on account of abject fear of women and children, to have present garrison removed. Commanding officer, Fort Brown, of even date, wires situation grave. One-third garrison guarding other two-thirds and preventing ingress to or egress from post. Remarkable and unmilitary situation. Citizens of Brownsville entertain race hatred to an extreme degree, making it necessary to divert competitors returning from Fort Sill. The provocation given soldiers not taken into account by civilians. Recommend temporary abandonment of Fort Brown as a military station and that troops now there be sent to Fort Reno, Okla.

MCCASKEY,
Brigadier-General, Commanding
Southwestern Division and Department of Texas.

Major Blocksom again reports, August 29 (Senate Doc. No. 155, p. 61):

1. The soldiers heard they were not to go to Camp Mabry because Texas troops had threatened to use ball cartridges against them in maneuvers. They knew Colonel Hoyt made a request that the Twenty-fifth be not sent to Texas.

2. The people did not desire the colored troops and thought they should not be sent here. I learned this before the rumored abandonment of Brown from prominent citizens, members of the committee of safety, etc. I think requests were sent to Senators, Congressmen, etc., to use their influence in the matter, but am not positive. If a fact, it is probably known at the War Department.

3. Soldiers of the Twenty-fifth were not allowed to drink with white people at the principal bars in town, though in some cases saloon keepers put up a separate bar for their use, this having an opposite effect to that intended. The bartender was killed in such a saloon.

Second Lieut. E. P. Thompson, Twenty-sixth Infantry, makes the following affidavit (S. Doc. No. 155, p. 514):

SAN ANTONIO, COUNTY OF BEXAR, The State of Texas, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one Edwin P. Thompson, who, being sworn, deposes and says:

That he is a second lieutenant in the Army of the United States; that in such capacity he served at Fort Brown, Brownsville, Cameron County, State of Texas, from September 4, 1903, until August 13, 1906; that when it was known that a battalion of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry was to garrison the post many derogatory remarks were made before its arrival by some citizens in reference to the colored soldiers in words as follows, or words to the like effect: "We don't want the damn niggers here;" "Niggers will always cause trouble;" "To hell with the colored soldiers; we want white men," and that he is unable to fix any one of such remarks upon any one citizen owing to the frequency with which like remarks were made and the period of time covered; that various minor clashes occurred between the individual citizens of the town and the soldiers; that one Teofilo Crixell, a saloonkeeper of Brownsville, Tex., told him that a row had occurred in the "White Elephant" Saloon, owned by one Vicente Crixell, in words to this effect, to wit: That one Bates, a Federal officer, was at the bar drinking when a colored soldier entered and asked for a drink; that the said Bates then turned to the soldier and said no nigger could drink at the same bar with him, and that upon the soldier remarking that he was as good as any white man said Bates drew his revolver and hit the soldier over the head; said Bates then going to the police headquarters and offering to pay his own fine.

Further deponent saith not.

E. P. THOMPSON,
Second Lieutenant, Twenty-sixth Infantry.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of September, 1906.

L. M. PURCELL,
Second Lieutenant, Twenty-sixth Infantry, Judge-Advocate.

Testimony of this character might be multiplied from both officers and men, but I will not weary the Senate with further extracts from the record testimony. These few indicate the feeling on the part of at least many of the civilians of Brownsville and their opposition to the location of colored troops at Fort Brown.

IDENTIFICATION OF THE RAIDERS.

This involves one of the important questions of this investigation. The so-called "identification" of eyewitnesses is entitled to most careful consideration. I am satisfied from listening to and reviewing the testimony, taking into consideration the character of the night, the midnight hour at which the raid occurred, the dimly lighted and shaded streets on the greater part of the route followed by the raiders, and streets and alley not lighted at all, that such identifications as are testified to by numerous witnesses were absolutely impossible. I would not accuse all of these witnesses of untruthfulness. They were impressed with the fact that the town was being raided, and that whatever forms they saw in the darkness was necessarily a soldier—that consequently they must be negro soldiers, as they were the only ones located in that vicinity.

An additional fact adding another possible difficulty in distinguishing the character or identity of the raiders may be found in the testimony—uncontradicted—that the old clothing or uniforms of the troops were thrown away and appropriated by the Mexican scavengers, and that they were constantly seen upon the streets clad in these discarded uniforms. (See testimony of Sergeant Frazier, p. 62–93, vol. 1, Hearings; also affidavits of numbers of men to the same effect, S. Doc. 155, p. 232, 233):

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. If I remember rightly, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day said it was impossible for these uniforms to be worn unless people had stolen them. Was it not in evidence that the Twenty-sixth Regiment threw a great many of their khaki uniforms and old hats and caps away?

Mr. BULKELEY. Yes; I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. I thought it was a rather peculiar statement at the time the Senator from Idaho made it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I think if the Senator from West Virginia will look over my remarks, he will find that I did not make the statement in the language that he quotes. But if it should occur that the uniforms were secured, I should like to have the Senator who is on the floor explain how these marauders from the outside got hold of them.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think I can do that to the Senator's entire satisfaction in a few moments.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no question about it.

Mr. BULKELEY. I will for the moment say they could have been readily secured from these discarded uniforms, both from the refuse left by the Twenty-sixth and from the discarded uniforms of the Twenty-fifth. I will present evidence showing that when they left Fort Brown the discarded uniforms were dumped upon the heap and taken by these scavengers, Mexican boys, and citizens.

Mr. SCOTT. And their hats and caps also.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Just for a question. Do I understand the Senator's contention to be that this raid was done by citizens of Brownsville, or by people who came into the town that night from the outside?

Mr. BULKELEY. I stated early in my remarks, I think quite clearly, that in my belief the raiding was done by the lawless element from outside of Brownsville, aided by the lawless element located therein.

Mr. BORAH. The contention, then, as I understand it, is that there were some people who came into Brownsville that night on horseback or otherwise and participated?

Mr. BULKELEY. The evidence so shows.

Mr. BORAH. And that the people within the town joined with those from the outside?

Mr. SCOTT. Certain people.

Mr. BULKELEY. I stated my theory that the lawless element—not the peaceful, well-behaved citizens of Brownsville, but the lawless element that resided within and without the city, smugglers and others, who were constantly under the surveillance and within the clutches of the officers of the law—connived at this conspiracy which I am trying to show. Here is an affidavit with thirty-six names attached thereto:

AFFIDAVIT T.—General affidavit—relative to citizens wearing old caps, etc.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA, County of Canadian, ss:

Personally appeared before me the undersigned, duly authorized to administer oaths in and for the county and Territory aforesaid, the following-named persons, who certify that they were members of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, stationed at Fort Brown, Tex.:

Affiants allege that soon after arrival at said fort they discarded all their old uniform, such as caps and uniform, and threw the same out in the rear of the garrison, and that many boys and men soon thereafter were seen by us wearing the said uniform that had been discarded, and that it was a common sight to see the same, as herein alleged.

Affiants further allege that during their stay at Fort Brown they did not wear any caps, but all wore hats.

Sergt. Mingo Sanders—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who signed this document?

Mr. BULKELEY. It is signed by about forty or fifty soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no contradiction of the testimony on that point. The citizens of Brownsville, one and all, who testified on that point, said that the khaki clothing was commonly worn by Mexicans and by all kinds and classes of citizens; that you could go into any store and buy a suit of khaki made up, which in the nighttime 5 feet away from you could not be distinguished from the uniform which the soldiers wore. The policemen wore that kind of uniform.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think the testimony which I am about to read will fully justify the remarks which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has so kindly made.

Sergt. Mingo Sanders was a soldier of twenty-five or thirty years' experience in the Army. All of his officers at that time, and all the officers that had been connected with the regiment during his long service, testified as to his standing as a soldier and as a man.

On page 339, volume 1, Hearings, Sergt. Mingo Sanders testifies:

* * * * * * *

Q. I want to ask you a question on another line. Do you know what kind of uniform the policemen of Brownsville wear?—A. They wore a khaki uniform.

Q. The same material as that of the uniforms of the soldiers?—A. Yes, sir; they were the same material, almost.

Q. Are they Americans or are they Mexicans, those policemen?—A. They are Mexicans.

Q. If you know?—A. They are Mexicans, so far as I seen; Mexican police.

On page 362, Q. M. Sergt. Thomas J. Green testifies:

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you, while you were at Brownsville, see any of the policemen of Brownsville?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of uniform do they wear?—A. Khaki.

Q. Similar to what the soldiers wear?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of hat did they have on?—A. The campaign hat.

Q. The campaign hat?—A. Yes, sir; only they had a gilded cord around it.

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. Did any of the citizens there wear khaki clothing?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator TALIAFERRO:

Q. How many policemen did you see?—A. I couldn't tell you, sir.

Q. Just approximately.—A. I have seen a good many of them, from time to time.

Q. And you remember distinctly that they wore khaki uniforms?—A. The policemen—that is, those men that were told to me to be policemen—had khaki uniforms.

Q. And hats like yours, except with a different kind of cord?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. I will ask if you saw Mexicans running around there with khaki clothing on, or not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that an unusual thing, to see citizens dressed in khaki?—A. Yes, sir; lots of citizens wore khaki.

Q. It was not unusual to see it?—A. No, sir.

By Senator OVERMAN:

Q. How many policemen were there in that town, do you know?—A. No, sir; I never was in the town ever three or four times the whole time I was down there.

Q. How many policemen did you see?—A. I have answered that question.

Q. You say every policeman you saw had on khaki. How many did you see?—A. I don't know. Every policeman I saw had on khaki uniform and a campaign hat.

Q. Was that the same man that you saw each time?—A. No, sir.

Q. How many did you see?—A. I couldn't say.

Q. Can't you give me an estimate?—A. No, sir; it would be just as impossible to tell you how many policemen there are in Brownsville as how many there are here in Washington.

To impeach the testimony of many if not the greater number of these eyewitnesses it only seems necessary to quote from the official utterances. Under date of January 12, 1907, the Secretary of War writes to the President (S. Doc. No. 155, part 2, p. 17):

There is a conflict as to the circumstances growing out of the evidence of the witnesses, which is entirely natural in respect to transactions during the daytime, and still more natural in respect to the transactions and the direction of sounds during the night, and there are some things about the evidence of McDonald, Mrs. Odin, and of Preciado, who testify with such detail as to seeing the negro soldiers—the one at garrison wall, the next at the alley of Miller's Hotel, and the third at the Tillman saloon—which, in view of previous statements, shake some the weight of what they say. Mrs. Odin's statements bear evidence of being affected by conversations with her husband, and there is a somewhat suspicious agreement as to exact details between their two statements.

Again, the Secretary of War addressed a communciation to the President in sending an additional affidavit in the case of Preciado, who, if anyone's testimony was good for anything, was in the best position of anybody that night to see and identify the soldiers if the raiders were soldiers. I call your attention to the statement of the Secretary of War.

Senate Document No. 155, part 2, page 19:

Letter of the Secretary of War to the President relative to additional testimony in the Brownsville case.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 14, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In my letter transmitting the additional evidence in the Brownsville case, I had occasion to comment on the circumstances which impaired the weight to be given to the evidence of Paulino Preciado, in which he stated that he saw the four or five men who killed the barkeeper, and recognized them as negro soldiers, admitting on examination that he had not made such a statement before, explaining it by saying that he was not asked. Since sending you the evidence and my letter of transmittal, I have come across what purports to be, and what I believe to be, a copy of a report of Preciado's evidence before the grand jury, which expressly contradicts and impeaches his evidence upon this point. I ask that this be forwarded to the Senate with your message and the other papers.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

GRAND JURY ROOM, September 10, 1906.

Paulino Preciado, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I live in Brownsville, Tex.; on the night of the shooting I was in the Ruby Saloon, belonging to Mr. Tillman, near midnight. We, myself, Antonio Torres, Nicolas Sanchez Alanis, and Mr. Tillman, were sitting in the yard, when we heard some shots. Tillman got up at once and left us. We remained with the bartender, Frank Natus; the latter closed the doors toward the street; in the meantime the shooting became heavier. Then the bartender went to close the door toward the alley. He went about 20 feet toward the door, when a volley was fired. Natus exclaimed, 'Ay Dios,' and fell down; I saw him because I was looking in that direction when the shots were fired. I saw I was in danger and went to one side. I could not see anybody in the alley, as it was dark out there and I was in the light. I heard no word spoken. I hid in a corner where a brick wall protected me until the shooting was over, then I went to close the alley gate. While I was in the corner I received a slight flesh wound on the left hand, and another passed through my coat and vest, breaking my spectacles, which I carried in the left breast pocket of my coat, but did not hurt me. I think I received the shots at the time Frank Natus fell, but did not notice it at the time. When the shooting was over I went and opened the front door, and asked the crowd of people who were there if there was an officer amongst them. Mr. Victoriano Fernandez came forward, and I told him what had happened.

"PAULINO S. PRECIADO."

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 10th day of September, 1906.

WM. VOLZ,
Foreman Grand Jury.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKELEY. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to interject there, for the benefit of Senators who are not familiar with this record, that this man Preciado, whom the Secretary of War thus disposes of, is the only man who, according to his testimony, claimed to have the benefit of artificial light to distinguish the men who were doing the firing.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BULKELEY. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if the gentleman who sat in the window of the hotel, the Miller House, did not declare that he saw them by the light in the street?

Mr. FORAKER. It was shown by the testimony that there was no light whatever in the street at that point.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator does not, I think, directly answer the question. Did not the gentleman—I have forgotten his name just for the moment——

Mr. BULKELEY. Odin.

Mr. CULBERSON. Who was in the Miller House, declare that he saw the soldiers by the light in the street?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know the witness to whom the Senator refers, but I do know that the testimony shows that there was no light by which anyone could have seen any soldier in the street at the point where it was claimed he saw them.

Mr. CULBERSON. My recollection is——

Mr. FORAKER. One moment, if the Senator will allow me. One man claimed that he looked half a square away from the mouth of the alley, a distance of 160 feet, and recognized that a man was a soldier as he turned around the corner, because he went under a lamp, the light of which fell on his face as the man looked back. The testimony is conclusive that nobody turned that corner at that time in any such way. That is the testimony of a citizen who lived immediately opposite who was looking out of the window at the time and could have seen if anybody had turned the corner.

Mr. CULBERSON. My recollection is refreshed by Senators around me that the name of this witness is Odin, who testified that he witnessed this from the window of the Miller Hotel.

Mr. FORAKER. The testimony of Odin was that he looked out and saw a soldier fire up toward the window, that he recognized him by the flash of the gun, and saw that he had freckles on his face. [Laughter.] All that will receive due consideration at the proper time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, Mr. President. My inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, who stated that a certain man was the only witness who testified that he saw by the aid of artificial light, was whether or not this man Odin did not testify that he saw——

Mr. FORAKER. If I said he was the only man who testified that he had the benefit of artificial light, I want to correct it. I did not mean that. I mean he testified that he had had aid of artificial light, and that he is the only witness who, according to the testimony, could possibly have had the benefit of artificial light; and he shows by his own testimony that he did not see anything—I mean when giving testimony before the grand jury.

Mr. CULBERSON. My purpose was simply to have the Senator correct his statement——

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. That the only witness was the one named by him who did not have the aid of artificial light.

Mr. FORAKER. Still I do not understand that Mr. Odin claims that he had the benefit of artificial light except by the flash of a gun; and we are able to show by the testimony of officers of the Army, who made experiments, that it is utterly impossible to recognize anything by the flash of one of these modern rifles.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio, with the permission of the Senator from Connecticut, a question. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that the witness to whom he refers is the only witness who testified that he had the advantage of artificial light to enable him to distinguish these raiders as soldiers. Do I understand the Senator to state that?

Mr. FORAKER. I think I probably did, from what the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has said; but I qualified that a moment ago, however, as the Senator from Tennessee must have heard. I think that this man is the only man who claims that he saw by the aid of artificial light, who was in a position to have had such help. Now, will the Senator give me the name of any other witness who so testified? We had so many of them that I can not recall all of them.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, Mr. Rendall, the witness who was occupying the position over the telegraph office, claimed distinctly that he saw the men on the inside of the wall by means of a light over the gate. The witness Amada Martinez, who was in the Cowen house at the time that these soldiers fired into the house, claims that she saw what was going on by the light of the lamp that was in the dining room, only a few feet from the window, where she went to close the blinds, and that she recognized the soldiers there. The witness Littlefield, who was at the mouth of Cowen alley and Thirteenth street, 120 feet away from the corner of Washington and Thirteenth streets, claimed distinctly that he saw and recognized the men as they ran under the lamp at the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets as soldiers. So that I think the Senator can not, under this record, justify the statement that Preciado was the only man who claimed that he saw these men by reason of artificial light.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I do not recall the remark I made as it was quoted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I certainly did not intend to put the statement in exactly the form in which he quoted it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, if the Senator from Ohio did not intend to use that language, it is all right.

Mr. FORAKER. My statement was, or should have been, as I corrected it when my attention was called to it, that he was the only one of the witnesses who claimed to have seen by the aid of artificial light who was in a position where he could have seen by artificial light, and he has been contradicted by his own testimony and the testimony of others.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Connecticut——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course I would not undertake to say that the Senator from Ohio used a particular term. I caught his expression, I thought, to the effect that this witness was the only one who claimed to have or who could have had the aid of artificial light. The record, of course, of the stenographer will show exactly what the Senator from Ohio said.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; it will show exactly; and if it shows what the Senator quoted, it was an erroneous statement, and it should be corrected, or should be modified rather in the way I indicated, when the Senator called my attention to it, that he was the only one of the witnesses who testified to seeing by the aid of artificial light, who was in a situation where he really could see by artificial light, if he had been in the position which he placed himself; but as to that he is utterly and flatly contradicted by his own testimony.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I call attention to the testimony of the telegraph operator, who testified that he saw by artificial light. While there is some dispute about all these questions, yet it must be conceded, I think, that the light was there for him to see by if he was in that place.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Connecticut, who is delivering a very carefully prepared speech, but all these matters to which the Senator refers will receive due attention at the proper time in so far as they have not already received it. As to Rendall and his wife, I commented upon their testimony the other day when discussing this subject. Two minutes after the first shot was fired anybody could see people marching in any direction almost in the reservation. All were astir; all were aroused; all was excitement; and men could be seen going here, yonder, and everywhere. What people saw then amounted to nothing.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as it is a question whether these soldiers were recognized on that night, and as it has been proven that it was rather a dark night, I will say that our friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], made one of his strongest points, as I understood him—of course he is a learned lawyer, and I am only a layman—on the testimony of Mrs. Leahy, who said that she saw from her window back of barracks "B" and recognized soldiers as shooting from that porch and then springing over the wall and running down this particular alley. I asked this same lady, when she was on the witness stand, if these soldiers wore hats. She said they did. I asked her where she was standing. She said in an upstairs window. I asked her how near was the nearest light. It was proven that it was about 180 feet, and that it was a carbon oil lamp. I said, "You are sure they were soldiers, and negro soldiers?" She said: "Yes, sir; I recognized them. One of them was a ginger-cake nigger and had freckles on his face."

The Senator from Idaho the other day, as I understood, made his strongest point on the evidence of that lady. I will leave it to the Senate whether or not such testimony as that would be taken in a court in the Senator's State at home or whether the Senate should take such testimony.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. So far as the darkness of that night is concerned, there is an abundance of testimony; and the great weight of the testimony is that it was not a dark night at all. There is no contention in this record upon the fact that it was a dark night. The witnesses all testified that it was a clear night, a starlit night, and while the moon was not shining, it was what was called an ordinarily light night. The only parties who testified that it was a dark night were the parties who were interested, after this charge was made, in having it appear that it was dark. The citizens, one and all, agree as to the kind of night it was.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I understand, Mr. President, that the Senator from Idaho is willing to rest his case on the testimony given by this lady, that she recognized these men absolutely as soldiers, because they wore hats, and she was in a second-story window looking down, and that one of them was "a ginger-cake nigger and had freckles on his face." The testimony of a witness of that kind of course carries great weight with him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not compelled to rest my case——

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKELEY. I am willing to yield at all times to a question, and will be glad to reply to any question——

Mr. SCOTT. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BULKELEY. But I do not want to yield to an argument between other Senators as to what they think.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I will not interfere if the Senator does not want me to, but I was asked a question which I should like to answer.

Mr. BULKELEY. I have no objection to the Senator asking me any question or interfering with me, but when he gets up a discussion with another Senator as to what happened, I must decline——

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator declines to yield?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly; I——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will be allowed to finish; and it is perhaps a selfish hope, because I want to get up an appropriation bill. Now, I understand if one Senator interrupts and alludes to the argument of another, that it is as necessary to yield to the second Senator as to the first; but I rather hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed now, as he wants to do, and finish his speech.

Mr. BULKELEY. Now, Mr. President, diverging from the remarks I have written, I want to reply for a moment to the question which was first interjected by the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], as to the witness who was impeached to some extent—and the Secretary of War impeaches the testimony of his wife on account of collusion between the two as to the details of the testimony that they should present to this committee—the facts are, Mr. President, that there was no light whatever within 150 feet of the point where Odin testified he saw these colored soldiers by the aid of artificial light. One light was located on the corner of Washington and Thirteenth streets, and the other light at the corner of Thirteenth street and Elizabeth street—more than 300 feet apart, and it is testified that none of these city lamps was more than 8 candlepower. Mayor Combe, in his testimony, in answer to some inquiries which I made myself, testified that the streets were comparatively full of trees; and Lieutenant Leckie says that the reflective power of all these city lamps—"the reflective radius," as he expresses it—was not to exceed 20 feet. If that testimony is correct, I would ask the Senator from Texas, or any other Senator, what possible aid from those lamps could this man, sitting with his wife, and whose testimony has been equally impeached with that of his wife, secure from those small 8-candlepower lamps, with a reflective radius of 20 feet, when they were at least 150 feet away from the locality where this man Odin said he saw these troops?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BULKELEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. According to the map that is upon Senators' desks, there seem to be but six street lamps within a radius of about that many blocks.

Mr. BULKELEY. There were only four.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Four, between Twelfth street and the fort?

Mr. BULKELEY. I think the Senator could not have been here when I explained the location of those lamps.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. BULKELEY. From Cowen alley from Fifteenth street to Twelfth street, which is the route taken by the raiders, as far as Thirteenth street there is not a single lamp, public or private. From Cowen alley to the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets, which was the extreme point over which the raiders traveled, there is only the lamp at the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets. So that on the direct route over which the raiders went there was not a single lamp from the fort to the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets, where the first and only lamp was located. There was a light on Elizabeth street, 20 or 30 feet from Cowen alley, and there was another one on the corner of Washington and Thirteenth streets, which is an equal distance from the alley. Those are all the lights that were in all this territory.

The Secretary of War says the testimony of Mrs. Odin should be impeached because of the evident collusion with her husband as to the details of their testimony. That it corresponds so closely in its details is evidence of that fact. I make the claim, Mr. President, and I believe it is a fair one, that the evidence of Mr. Odin and Mrs. Odin, for the reasons stated by the Secretary of War, even if the facts which they state are true, is not entitled to any credence in this investigation.

The lieutenant of the police, Dominguez, who lost his arm in the raid, was another of this class of witnesses, but his opportunities to see the raiders were limited to two points (see testimony, vol. 3, p. 2114), as the soldiers crossed the alley at Fourteenth street and again as he rode across the alley at its intersection with Thirteenth street, when, as he testified:

I was riding fast on horseback.

Now, to contradict his testimony, I will state that Policeman Padron was stationed at the corner of Washington and Fourteenth streets, where the lieutenant testifies that he went, looking down Fourteenth street, and saw these soldiers crossing this alley by the flash of the guns.

The policeman, Padron, testifies on page 2145, volume 3, Senate hearings, as follows:

Q. But I want to know whether this firing that lighted up the faces of the men so you could tell their uniforms, whether that was over when the lieutenant arrived?—A. I returned from the corner of Fourteenth and Washington, along Washington, and there I met the lieutenant.

Q. Did not the lieutenant come to Fourteenth and Washington streets?—A. No; he came to about the middle of the square.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did the lieutenant go down with you to Fourteenth and Washington?—A. No; he did not reach that point.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did not go down to the corner at all?—A. No.

If this testimony of the policeman, Padron, is to be relied on, the lieutenant could not have seen the soldiers at Cowen alley and Fourteenth street, as he has testified; at the only other point of observation, Cowen alley and Thirteenth street, where he testifies he "was riding fast," I submit, Mr. President, that looking down into a dark and absolutely unlighted alley from a distance of 30 to 40 feet that any sort of identification would be impossible.

I now come to the poor Mexican woman who lived with the Cowen family, whose house was located at the corner of Fourteenth street and Cowen alley, facing Fourteenth street. She was evidently, if I could judge by her appearance upon the stand, an ignorant Mexican woman, unable to speak English, and very little qualified, so far as I could observe, to intelligently disclose, for many reasons, what she saw or thought she saw that night.

But I want to call the attention of Senators to the situation and surroundings of the house from which her observations were made. Here is a photograph [exhibiting] which shows the house. If any Senators are interested enough at any time to look at the exhibits which are in the files of the Senate, they will find this photograph is No. 12 in Senate Document No. 155.

I call your attention to the fact that it is located some feet back from the alley, not close to the alley, and is separated from the alley by a closed board fence several feet in height and, as the evidence shows, coming up about to the shoulders of an ordinary man. I say it would have been impossible, looking out from the low windows of this low house over this board fence, which was the height of an ordinary man's shoulders, for this woman, who was only at the window for a moment, while the firing was in progress, to be able to describe, with such completeness as she states, the dress of a man from head to foot—leggings—covered by a board fence—belt around the center of his body—covered by a closed board fence, and of a sufficient height to disclose only the firings that were over the fence.

So I conclude that her testimony is entitled to very little, if any, credence, because I can see, and I think any Senator who will give it thought for a moment will see, that standing as those men must have been on the ground, and a closed board fence between them and this low Mexican house, which this picture discloses, it was absolutely impossible for anybody, whatever their intelligence, looking out into the darkness, to be able, in the detail of leggings and belts, to describe from head to foot the clothing of anyone.

Now, another witness, and the one to which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] referred, I could dismiss without a word of comment. I feel certain that, with all her fearlessness, because she asserted—and her appearance justified the assertion—that she did not stand in fear of any man—lightning was the only thing she was afraid of—with her appearance on the witness stand, her unfavorable impression on the other members of the committee, that little, if any, reliance was given to her testimony. It was impossible in that midnight darkness and looking through the trees of the surrounding properties to see 300 feet away and distinguish with the distinctness which she described the appearance and form of soldiers on the porch of the barracks. The officers of that fort had great difficulty in the open in distinguishing each other and in distinguishing themselves at distances as described by these officers, times without number, of 5 or 10 feet.

These witnesses whom I have named—this woman, the lieutenant of police, Preciado, the two Odins, and McDonald—comprise almost the entire number of so-called "eyewitnesses" and "identifiers" of these raiders.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. Will it interrupt the course of the Senator's argument if I ask him a question?

Mr. BULKELEY. No, sir; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. FULTON. I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs while this testimony was being taken, and heard considerable of it, and read it all very carefully. To my mind the testimony was overwhelming that some of the negro soldiers did the shooting. The Senator takes up the testimony of each individual who testified that he or she saw negro soldiers, identified them as soldiers, and points out some fact which, to his mind, tends to weaken the testimony of that individual.

While there is much truth in what the Senator says, and in the criticisms he makes on the individual testimony, there was this fact which appealed to me, and I ask the Senator how it affected his judgment: That immediately after the shooting the people assembled, as naturally they would, in crowds about the town, and there was but one voice from all of the people, and that was that the shooting had been done by the negro troops. There was no dissenting voice in any crowd, apparently. Everybody who at that time said he had seen the persons who did the shooting said it was the negro troops. Nobody seemed to make any other statement. There could have been no conspiracy extending throughout all the inhabitants of the town to cause them to come together and thus talk and thus designate the perpetrators of the outrage.

Mr. BULKELEY. There is no evidence whatever to substantiate even the suggestion that in this assembled crowd there was a single one of the so-called "eyewitnesses." There is every evidence to my mind that this assembled crowd to which the Senator has alluded embraced a very different class of men, to which I shall allude at a later period of my remarks.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say one thing, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator to say it.

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. It is in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

The testimony to which he refers did not appeal to me at all, because, without an exception, the men who merely heard the firing and who did not pretend to see anybody were convinced from the first shots, according to their own testimony, that it was the negroes and nobody else.

Take the case of Mr. Hammond, who was sitting at the Miller Hotel and heard the shots. He immediately announced "The negroes have broken out at the garrison and are shooting up the town." Nobody had told him anything. The state of mind was such that the citizens of that town seemed to jump to the conclusion, whether they saw something or did not see something, that the soldiers were doing the shooting.

Mr. FULTON. It would perhaps be quite natural that persons who did not see those who were actually engaged in the shooting, but who heard the shooting come from the direction where the troops were, should surmise it was the troops who were doing the shooting. But I think the Senator from Connecticut is mistaken when he says none of those who saw the shooting were in the crowds that assembled.

Mr. BULKELEY. Does the Senator from Oregon claim there is any evidence to show there was one man in the crowd who claimed to have seen the shooting?

Mr. FULTON. Yes. I have the evidence here.

Mr. BULKELEY. Except possibly the policeman.

Mr. FULTON. The policeman and some of the others; those who were around in saloons.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think if the Senator will wait until I reach that point, he will see the character of that crowd.

Mr. FULTON. But what I desired particularly to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to, and to ask him to explain, because it is a fact which has great influence in my mind, is that either the negroes did the shooting or somebody else did. The shooting was done.

Mr. BULKELEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. FULTON. Everybody among the citizens of the town, when they met the next morning and when they met immediately after the occurrence, said it was the negro troops. Some of those people——

Mr. BULKELEY. They naturally were not going to charge themselves with it.

Mr. FULTON. Some of those people had seen the parties who did the shooting, and they told others. Everybody who said it was the negro troops was not an eyewitness, but some of them had been. It is a most remarkable fact that not a single person in all that town pretended to have seen anybody else than negro soldiers.

Mr. BULKELEY. I will reach that at a later period in my discussion.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he thinks that any more remarkable than that a body of ten or twenty men should march through the town shooting right and left, with every man in the town himself armed, with his bedroom full of rifles and pistols, and with armed policemen about, and that the marchers should suddenly disappear and no human being be able to tell in what direction they went?

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me——

Mr. BULKELEY. I do not want to yield for any discussion between Senators.

Mr. FORAKER. I only mention that to show how many remarkable things there are connected with this case.

Mr. FULTON. I do not want to intrench upon the time of the Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. BULKELEY. I am perfectly willing to answer any question; but if Senators want to discuss this question, I wish they would discuss it in their own time and not mine.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Connecticut is quite right.

Mr. FULTON. I was only undertaking to answer the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BULKELEY. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I realize that any Senator who rises and is recognized can proceed, but I want to remind the Senate of one thing. This Brownsville matter is not up regularly, nor is there pending a motion to take it up. It is up on the courtesy of the Senate, extended always to a Senator who has a prepared speech. The Senator from Connecticut has shown an unwillingness to be interrupted in the general flow of his remarks. I hope he will be permitted to proceed, and I hope so, because I think we ought to get some of the appropriation bills into the hands of conferees. At least some of the members of the Senate are involved in a great many conferences, and some of the conferences are of a nature that will take a great deal of time.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, just a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I was perhaps the offender in this instance, because I asked a question. I only want to say that while I recognize the importance of considering the appropriation bills, when the courtesy is extended to a Senator to make a speech I think we will have to insist upon our right to ask questions when there is something we want to have explained.

Mr. BULKELEY. I recognize fully the propriety, in order to meet the views of many Senators and others, of getting the appropriation bills through the Congress as rapidly as possible. But I believe that the questions involved in this discussion, involving justice to fellow-men and servants of the Republic, are of enough importance to postpone for a few minutes or for a few hours the discussion even of financial measures.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BULKELEY. I am not criticising the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I agree perfectly with the Senator. Only I think that he will agree with me that when we enter into a general discussion of this question we ought to take it up with that understanding and go on with it. I think he is right about the importance of it, and I hope we will take plenty of time before we get through to thrash it out so that everybody will understand it.

Mr. BULKELEY. I have no doubt we will.

Mr. FORAKER. We will have plenty of time to discuss it thoroughly before the Congress adjourns.

Mr. WARREN. Of course we will. That is right. There will be no division of sentiment on that.

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. BULKELEY. Now, these witnesses, whom I have named, whom the Government, even, through the Secretary of War, has discredited—and it needed no words of mine to discredit their testimony—with the policeman, comprise practically all the so-called eyewitnesses. So far as concerns policemen other than those already referred to—I think Dominguez, as the lieutenant, is the only one I have referred to—I shall content myself with quoting from the testimony of Captain Kelly, one of Brownsville's most prominent citizens, chairman of the citizens' committee which conducted the first investigation of this affray, as to their character for truth and veracity.

Testimony of Capt. William Kelly, page 2561:

Q. Mayor Combe has testified that Policeman Padron told him that he fired his revolver, down on Washington street, in that direction.—A. Yes. As to Policeman Padron, I am very much about that as I am about the negroes.

Q. You do not believe the policemen, either?—A. No, sir.

Q. Well, I don't either.

Senator TALIAFERRO. You agree on one point, anyway.

By Senator FRAZIER:

Q. You do not mean to say that Padron's evidence given here as detailing the facts of the shooting of Dominguez was not true?—A. I do not know; I have not read that. I do not know what he testified to. But I mean the Mexican of that class is very liable to lie, if he thinks he might lie.

By Senator OVERMAN:

Q. Is that the character of Dominguez?—A. Very much.

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. They are all that way, are they not?—A. Yes, sir. There are some of them——

Q. But these policemen, you think, are a very shiftless and unreliable lot?—A. They are not the best of the Mexicans, by a long ways.

Q. The way they acted would seem to indicate that.—A. Yes; that is one thing. I believe that the men Mrs. Leahy hid in her house, or wherever she put them, were not the only ones that sought similar shelter somewhere.

Q. Then, whatever they would say you would take with a good deal of allowance?—A. Yes.

Q. And be very careful about it?—A. I would certainly consider whether it was in accordance with the other facts.

By Senator WARNER:

Q. You have known Dominguez a good while?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The lieutenant of police?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He is an honest and truthful man?—A. Yes; an honest and truthful man, and a very courageous man.

By Senator TALIAFERRO:

Q. Then you did not understand Senator OVERMAN'S question a while ago, when he asked you if Dominguez was the kind of a Mexican that you were describing?—A. No, no. Dominguez is not like that. I am not very certain about it, but I think he is not a Mexican. I think his father was a Greek.

Pages 2552, 2553:

Q. The testimony shows that there were nine or ten policemen on duty that night.—A. Oh, they were on duty all over town, I judge. I do not know where they were. My belief is that most of the Mexican police were in hiding; that is my personal belief.

Q. We understand that two of them were.—A. That is my belief.

Q. You know Mrs. Leahy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. She keeps a hotel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. We understand that she took care of two of them.—A. I have heard that she secreted two of them in her house; yes.

Q. But that would leave seven or eight out in the town who could have followed those men.—A. I do not think they were really following those people.

Q. Do you think there was any trouble, when twenty or thirty of these men were marching through the streets and shooting up the town, for somebody to have shot and killed some of them? If they had done that, we would have had no trouble at all in knowing whether they were soldiers or not.—A. There were no citizens out, as I understand it, until those soldiers went back in the barracks.

With the impeachment of most of the witnesses by the Secretary of War in his communication to the President, the impeachment of the balance of them, almost every one, by the evidence of the chief citizen of the town, the chairman of the investigating committee, Captain Kelly; the surroundings of the night and its darkness; the poorly lighted streets of the city, mostly not lighted at all, the evidence is convincing to me that any attempted or supposed identification of the soldiers, if soldiers they were, was absolutely impossible.

An investigation of visual observations, or powers of vision at night under conditions similar to those in Brownsville, was conducted by Army officers at Fort McIntosh (Lieutenant Blyth, Lieutenant Harbold, Lieutenant Wiegenstein, and Colonel Stucke). Colonel Stucke was not an Army officer. He was an engineer who happened at that time to be located in the vicinity of Fort McIntosh.

As a result of such observations Lieutenant Blyth testifies, Hearings, volume 2, pages 1990–1993:

Q. Now, go ahead and describe what that experiment was.—A. He arranged to have the men go down there at night. We did not know how he was going to conduct it at all. After everything was ready we went out at about half past 8 in the evening and stood on the edge of an arroyo. The men were down underneath. When the first volley was fired Major O'Neil shouted to him and asked him which way the men were facing. We could not tell. Lieutenant Wiegenstein laughed and said that was a part of the test; that he did not care to say. He wanted us to find out for ourselves.

Then we moved down about 50 feet farther, I should say, along the edge of the arroyo. Two more volleys were fired, and some fired at will, but all we could see was the flash of the rifle. We could not see the rifle that fired it.

Q. Have you any memorandum that shows the distances at which you were making the observation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please produce the memorandum and tell us how far the squad was away from you when the first firing which you have mentioned was done.—A. The first firing on the horizontal was 50 feet and 4 inches, and the vertical height was 21 feet and 2 inches.

Q. That was which firing, the second or the first?—A. It was the first.

Q. You were that far distant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And at that distance could you distinguish the men?—A. No, sir.

Q. Could you tell whether they were white men or negroes or Mexicans?—A. The light was not sufficient for us to tell which way they were facing even.

Q. You could not even tell that?—A. No, sir.

Q. Could you tell anything about the different articles of clothing they wore?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there a further firing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did that take place? How far were you from them?—A. That was 24 feet on the horizontal and 20 feet 7 inches above them. The results were the same.

Q. Then there was another trial?—A. Yes, sir; we moved down then.

Q. You moved down or they moved down?—A. We moved down to another place. That was 69 feet 2 inches away and 20 feet 5 inches above them; and looking almost into their faces, when the volleys were fired, all we could see was the flash, that was all.

Q. You could not tell anything about their faces, you mean?—A. We could see nothing but the flash.

Q. And you could tell nothing about their clothes?—A. No, sir; we could not even see the rifles that were fired.

Q. You could not even see the rifles?—A. No, sir.

Q. Could not tell whether they were Krags or Springfields or Winchesters or what?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any other firing, still another test?—A. Yes, sir; after that they marched down one arroyo and came up another, almost directly underneath us, in single file, but we failed to distinguish anyone, could not tell who they were at all. They were halted then underneath us, at that time 20 feet and 5 inches below and 18 feet and 7 inches from us. Then the flash of the rifles would come, and the eye would involuntarily close. The closer it got, the more the noise of the report and the flash of the rifle attracted your eye. Before you could take your eye away to look for anything else, the light would disappear, so it was impossible to see anything.

Q. Did you make any further tests?—A. Yes, sir; we brought the men up——

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. After these firings in the arroyo, what happened next?—A. We brought the men up on the bank—took them up on the road. The road was about 8 feet wide. We divided ourselves into two parties, one party on each side of the road. The moon was shining, and it was a clear starlight night, so there was a good light. The men were marched past, in single file, between us, and we wanted to see if we could distinguish the features of the men. After they all passed by I asked Major O'Neil to have a number of white officers march past, so I could get the exact distance to us from them, to see if I would get the same impression that I did from the soldiers going by. Lieutenant Wiegenstein came back and laughed and said: "Then you don't know that there are white men in the line?" I said: "No; I did not know that." So the detail was halted and I went up and scanned each man's face. We were about 2 feet from them at that time. I peered right into their faces, and I myself picked out one man who was a little lighter colored than the remainder, and he turned out to be a Mexican. The other men I did not distinguish at all. After we had passed he told me that there was a white man in the center of the line, and also a man who, I believe, was an Italian.

Q. Did you have any further experiments?—A. That night, after the moon went down, we went out and had the same experiments.

Q. With the same results?—A. And with the same results. The only difference was that after the moon went down, and at a greater distance—we were 69 feet and 2 inches away—when the rifles were fired by volley what I saw was just a long line of legs with dark material. It seemed to be long trousers that the men had on, but after the experiment was over and they were brought up on the bank I found that they had on khaki breeches and leggings. So I received a false impression.

Q. And you observed as closely as you could?—A. Yes, sir; we cautioned one another to watch. Not only that, but after the first volley was fired we cautioned one another to watch where the faces should be.

Q. What interest had Colonel Stucke, if any, in that investigation?—A. None whatever; no interest at all. He was there as a guest of Major O'Neil to dinner and went out with us after dinner.

Q. He is not connected in any way with the command?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you all of one mind as to the result of the investigation?—A. As far as it went. It was impossible to distinguish features by the flash of a rifle, or to distinguish color or complexion.

Q. After nightfall, when the firing was in the dark?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any further experiments?—A. We had another one on the 11th of March at night. At that time Captain Lewis and Lieutenant Harbold and myself were the observers.

Q. Was that of this same general nature?—A. Of the same nature as in the arroyo. After the firing in the arroyo we came up and went into my house, and went upstairs and looked out of two windows, 3 feet away, down, and the men were marched past underneath the windows, and we failed to recognize any features or any complexion. We could distinguish from the light shining out from my window on the first floor that they had on shirts made of dark material of some kind, and lighter trousers, but what they were we could not tell.

Q. Yes.—A. Then they were moved around in front of the house and marched across the parade ground, and in rear of a light, and when they got about 60 feet away we were unable to see them. They disappeared entirely from view. They were brought back and marched between a street lamp and my porch—we were all sitting there—the distance being about 20 paces. We afterwards measured that. We did not recognize anyone. Then they were brought around, and right along on the sidewalk in front of the house, which is only 5 paces away, and at that distance we failed to recognize Lieutenant Wiegenstein, who was in the center. We did not know he was there. He was the only white man in the lot.

Q. What was the character of the night? Was it an unusually dark night?—A. The stars were shining, and there was no moon.

Q. The stars were shining, and no moon?—A. Yes, sir; with a street lamp only 20 paces away.

Q. Now, if anyone were to say that looking out of a window of a dark night he or she saw a gun fired, and recognized by the flash of that gun, it being a high-power rifle such as you have in use, the face of a man as that of a negro, and was able to detect that he had freckles on his face, what would you think of that kind of a statement, from your observation and experience?—A. I would not believe it.

Q. You would not believe it?—A. No, sir.

Q. And what would you believe of a statement of similar character, to the effect that by the flashes of rifles it could be determined whether the hats worn by the men shooting the rifles were black hats or gray hats, or whether they had cords around them or not?—A. With our rifles the experiments showed that the flash of a rifle was not sufficient to show you anything.

Q. You could not tell what kind of a rifle it was, even?—A. No, sir; you could not even see the rifle that fired the shots.

The testimony of all the other officers engaged in this investigation was of the same general character and need not occupy the time of the Senate.

These statements would justify the conclusions, from the character of the testimony of at least one of the witnesses, that but little, if any, credence can be given to the record testimony as to any satisfactory identification of soldiers that night.

THE FIRST SHOT.

The testimony of the citizens of Brownsville, with exceptional cases, is, that the firing was down in the direction of the fort, and no attempt is made to locate it within the reservation. Mayor Combe, who was aroused by the early firing, testifies.

I was sleeping on the back porch. I dozed off and was not very sound asleep when I heard what I thought to be four or five pistol shots in a southerly direction from my home.

This would be, as he states later, in the direction of the barracks.

Captain Kelly says—and this testimony is somewhat in explanation of the character of the first firing—and shows to my mind conclusively that the firing heard by Mayor Combe, that heard by Captain Kelly and all citizens of Brownsville, was of such a character as to come from guns that were not in the hands of troops. Captain Kelly, pages 2528–2529, volume 3, Hearings, testifies:

Q. Did you hear the shooting?—A. Oh, yes; very distinctly. I was in my library reading. I got up and went to the front of the house and lighted a couple of gaslights there to see if I could see where it was, but I was unable to see anything. At first I thought the shots were some Mexican procession, possibly, passing. That is about the only shooting we ever have there.

Q. What is the character of that shooting?—A. Well, they carry with them fireworks that they make, that they call cuetas—a sort of imitation of Chinese firecrackers—and when they have a procession at night—they have a great many of them, frequently celebrating saints' days——

Q. A great many saints' days?—A. Yes, sir; quite a number; and quite a number of nonsaints' days. They have anniversaries there. They celebrate the birthday of Diaz and the battle of Pueblo, at which he made his first success, and all that sort of thing. The societies turn out, and they fire these cuetas.

Q. You did not go out of your house?—A. No; I did not go out at all.

Q. And you knew nothing as to who were charged with doing the shooting up until the next morning?—A. No; nothing at all. I did not know anything about it.

So that this shooting, with all its dangers, does not seem to have been the cause of great trouble to the better part certainly of the citizens of Brownsville. Most of these so-called "eyewitnesses," after the five or ten minutes during which this shooting was going on, retired quietly to their homes, as they have testified, and never went on the street to join with the lawless mob that was assembled there and only dispersed by the authorities.

Notes by Major Blocksom on affidavits taken before Captain Lyon (submitted in Colonel Lovering's report).

When at Fort Brown I found a number of men positive that shots were fired toward the post. Their statements were based on flashes from rifles and sounds of bullets only. I could find no evidence of bullets striking anywhere in the post and none has yet been given. My theory (p. 3[44] of my report), sustained by the general trend of evidence given by soldiers and citizens, is that first shots (especially those toward post) were fired high (for effect only upon the minds of men in the garrison). I heard nothing of the expression "black —— of ——," etc. It will be noticed that the affidavits containing them were made by C Company men a month or more after the occurrence. As far as known, the soldiers of that company were the only ones, with one exception, who had trouble in town before the 13th of August. Nobody in B Company seems to have heard the expression, though the quarters were much nearer the firing than C Company's.

A. P. BLOCKSOM,
Major, Inspector-General.

If Major Blocksom's theory is correct, it sustains and gives a reason why no marks of bullets were found in the barracks by Major Penrose or any other officer. They were fired high in the air for a purpose, Mr. President, in connection with the language that was used with respect to this firing and which Major Blocksom quotes in his report, and which I shall not venture to quote here even to sustain my remarks.

These comments of Major Blocksom conformed to the mass of evidence which might be culled from the testimony to the effect that the first shots from mixed arms, especially those toward the post, were fired high, for effect only upon the minds of the garrison. I shall content myself with inserting here but a limited amount of testimony upon this important point, which leads up to the conclusion that the raiders could be looked for elsewhere than among the men of the garrison. I firmly believe that these first shots and the language used in connection therewith was an effort to draw the men out of their quarters and into a personal altercation without arms, as it must have been well known that they were securely locked in the gun racks. It is hardly conceivable that soldiers would have entered into a conspiracy to shoot up the town and commence the execution by first arousing the garrison and its officers, as was the effect of this shooting, and then escape detection and punishment.

Lieut. Henry S. Grier, who was the adjutant of the post, testifies, Hearings, volume 2, page 1699:

Q. Did you hear any bullets at all that night that you remember?—A. I thought when I was coming across the parade ground to the east about up in front of the commanding officer's quarters I heard a scattering of shot on the ground, but I would not be positive about it. It might have been something else; some other noise.

Q. That it is the only thing you heard that sounded like bullets?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator WARNER. He has not said they sounded like bullets.

A. I said it sounded more like shot.

Q. Did you mean shot as though——A. Yes; like buckshot from a shotgun, or something of that kind.

Matias G. Tamayo, the scavenger, who went on duty every night about 11 o'clock, and who was in the best position of any one, for he was awake and performing his duties when the shooting commenced, testifies, Hearings, volume 2, pages 1206–1207:

Q. Got down on the ground and picked up a can and emptied it?—A. Yes, sir; and then I set it on the ground. I heard the first shot.

Q. Where was that fired from?—A. I think it was fired from right along this alley here [indicating on map].

Q. What did you do after that?—A. I heard a lot of shooting.

Q. Then what did you do?—A. I put my lantern out as soon as I heard the first two shots.

Q. Then what did you do?—A. I stood for a little while facing the place where the firing was going on.

Q. Yes.—A. And at the same time I could see the galleries, right here [indicating on map], and the place where the firing was taking place, right in front of me.

Q. What was taking place?—A. The firing taking place.

Q. You are not pointing to the town?—A. No, sir; I am not [pointing to the map].

Q. The firing was in town?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any men moving about there before that first shot was fired?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any lights about the barracks?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any noise about, anywhere?—A. No, sir; everything was quiet.

Q. Everything was quiet?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any men moving about inside the wall near the sink of B Company?—A. No, sir.

He was within 25 feet of the point where this man Rendall testifies that, looking down Garrison road, unlighted, 150 feet, he saw a body of men jumping over the wall. This man Tamayo was performing his nightly service and standing between the point where Rendall was looking out of a window and within 20 or 30 feet of the point where Rendall saw the men jump over the wall, and he was in close proximity with the wall all the time, stationed between the barracks and the wall.

Q. Did you see anybody jump over the fence or the wall there in rear of B Company, opposite the mouth of Cowen alley?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or at any other place?—A. No, sir.

Q. If there had been any shots fired from the upper windows of B, C, and D barracks, were you in a situation to have seen them?—A. Yes, sir; I could very easily have seen them, because I could see the barracks here—around right here in front of me [indicating on map].

Q. Now, were any shots fired from the barracks?—A. Not while I was there; no, sir.

Q. How about the first shots?—A. I heard the first shots and then about twenty more shots, and then I drove off.

Q. When they commenced shooting, then you left immediately?—A. I went away immediately.

Q. With your cart?—A. Yes, sir. At the same time when I heard this first shot I heard a few bullets going into the post over the administration building.

Q. That is important. Which way were they going?—A. They went up into the air.

Q. Went up in the air?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could you tell which way?—A. Across that way [indicating on map].

Pages 1208–1209:

Senator FORAKER. Yes. Now, you have testified before in this case. I want to read you an affidavit that was made on the 14th day of August, 1906, found at page 75 of Senate Document No. 155.

(The affidavit referred to is as follows:)

FORT BROWN, State of Texas:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one Matias G. Tamayo, scavenger at Fort Brown, Tex., who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

"That at about 12.10 a. m. on the morning of August 14, 1906, he was in rear of the quarters occupied by Company B, Twenty-fifth

Infantry; that about this time a shot was fired by some person unknown in the street just outside the wall dividing the military reservation from the town of Brownsville, Tex.; that he could hear the bullet and that it appeared to be going in the direction of the Rio Grande River, about parallel to the above-mentioned wall; that immediately following this one shot a number of other shots were fired, all outside the wall.

"Deponent further says that previous to the shooting he saw no soldiers anywhere in rear of the quarters occupied by the companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, and heard no talking or news of any kind; and that he saw and heard no shot or shots from any of the company barracks.

"MATIAS G. TAMAYO,
"Scavenger, Fort Brown, Tex."

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 14th day of August, 1906.

SAMUEL P. LYON,
Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Summary Court.

A most rigid examination and cross-examination by almost every member of your committee failed to confuse this witness or shake the weight of his testimony. Of all the witnesses, he was the one that was awake and in a position to see what was going on immediately behind the wall of the reservation. He was a Brownsville boy, and had but little time to interest himself with the members of the battalion during their two weeks at Fort Brown.

James H. Howard, Senate Document No. 155, pages 74–75 and 169:

FORT BROWN, TEX, August 14, 1906.

FORT BROWN, State of Texas:

Personally appeared before me the undersigned authority, Private J. H. Howard, Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

"I was a member of the post guard on the night of the 13th and 14th of August, 1906. I was posted as a sentinel on post No. 2, which extends around the barracks, keeping the buildings on my left, at 10.30 p. m., August 13. At about 12.10 on the morning of the 14th, when between C and D Company barracks, I heard a single shot, then five or six, and then a regular fusilade. The shots seemed to come from the street in the rear of the brick wall back of B Company's barracks. I thought they were shooting at me, and I looked in the direction of the sounds to see if I could see anybody, but I could not, and then I went to the front of the barracks and gave the alarm, by firing my piece three times and calling for the guard. I did not see anybody at all but the post scavenger, who was at the sinks in the rear of B Company's barracks. As soon as the shooting commenced he drove away with his cart.

"JOSEPH H. HOWARD,
"Private, Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry."

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 20th day of August, 1906.

SAMUEL P. LYON,
Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Trial Officer, Summary Court.

FORT BROWN, State of Texas, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one Joseph H. Howard, private, of Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

"About 12 midnight, Monday, August 13, 1906, I was a sentinel on guard on post No. 2, which extends completely around the four barracks. The first thing that occurred that was unusual was a shot fired in the road opposite where I was at the time, on my post opposite the interval between B and C Company quarters. Several other shots followed in quick succession, and after a short interval what sounded like a fusillade of shots. My first impression was that I was being fired upon. I shouted the alarm after I had looked in that direction and had been unable to see anything. Then I ran to the front of the barracks, passing between B and C Company quarters, and there stayed until the companies had formed, when I returned to that portion of my post. I did not see anyone cross my post except men going to and from the closets before taps. After the shooting men were stationed along the wall alongside of my post. At the time of the shooting the scavenger was at work at the closets along the wall. I do not know who did the shooting. The reports sounded like rifle shots to me. I should judge about fifty or more shots were fired.

"Further deponent saith not.

"JOSEPH H. HOWARD,
"Private, Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry."

Subscribed and sworn to before me at Fort Brown, Tex., this 20th day of August, 1906.

SAMUEL P. LYON,
Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Trial Officer, Summary Court.

Howard was the sentry and, when the shooting commenced, fired the alarm from his rifle and called for the corporal of the guard. All the flashes of guns which witnesses have testified as being within the walls of the reservation I think can readily be attributed to the firing of these signal guns in the air by the witness Howard, who was on guard at his post on his own beat at that hour and who performed his duty by discharging a signal of distress, recognized almost everywhere, and calling for the corporal of the guard.

Mingo Saunders, with a service in the Army of twenty-five years or thereabouts, testifies to the same effect. He was allowed, on account of his long service, to sleep out of quarters, but within the reservation, and he testifies that in proceeding toward the fort the bullets were whizzing over his head.

Sergt. J. R. Reid, Senate Document No. 155, page 75:

FORT BROWN, TEX., August 23, 1906.

Sergt. J. R. Reid, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry, stated to me that he did not have the call to arms sounded (he was sergeant of the guard on the night of the 13th of August) until the shots came so fast that he thought post was attacked. He stated also that he formed the guard before having the call sounded.

A. P. BLOCKSOM,
Major, Inspector-General.

Charles E. Rudy, Senate Document No. 155, page 164:

Personally appeared before me the undersigned authority, one Charles E. Rudy, an artificer of Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says as follows:

"That he was asleep on the front porch of his company quarters at Fort Brown, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906, when he was awakened about 12 o'clock by a shot. That this first shot seemed to come from the direction of Brownsville, and that right after that shot a number of shots were fired very rapidly near where the first shot was fired. That he got up and went into the quarters, and that by the time he got inside the quarters "call to arms" had sounded, and he went to the gun rack to get his gun, but he found the gun rack locked and went to the back door and looked out to see if he could see the shooting, and saw the flash of a number of guns which were being fired from along the wall which separates Fort Brown from Brownsville, and that it looked as though they were being fired on the outside of the wall. It was so dark that he could not see who was firing, but from the flashes it looked as though about twenty-five or thirty people were firing. From the direction of the flashes it looked as though the parties firing were firing in the direction of B Company's quarters, and high. That as the shooting continued he heard cursing and calls of 'Come out, you black —— of ——, and we will kill all of you,' from where the shooting was going on. That he left the door and went to get his rifle and fall in with the company outside of the quarters, and saw no more of the shooting. That he does not know who did this shooting.

"CHARLES E. RUDY,
"Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry."

Sworn to and subscribed before me at Fort Reno, Okla., this 12th day of September, 1906.

SAMUEL P. LYON,
Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Summary Court.

This quoted testimony and a volume more which would be merely cumulative form the basis of Major Blocksom's report.

The failure to get the troops outside of the reservation compelled the raiders to pursue their murderous work through the town if their plot to get rid of the soldiers was to prove successful. It is a remarkable fact that, with an armed police force scattered through the town, no concerted effort was made to interfere, pursue, or follow this band of outlaws. If I were to trace these outlaws to their hiding—and I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] to my statement now, because I think it answers his remark—I should seek them in the crowd of armed men that assembled with the police on Elizabeth street immediately the shooting ceased, looking for a leader to make a further attack on the fort, and were only dispersed by the earnest appeals of Mayor Combe.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BULKELEY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. If it be true that they were there looking for a leader, making an attack on the fort, the Senator can not certainly insist that they had previously organized and attacked the town, because they were disorganized, looking for a leader to attack the fort.

Why attack the fort if somebody in the fort had not attacked them, and why were they looking for a leader to do it?

Mr. BULKELEY. As a part of the conspiracy to drive this garrison away from Brownsville.

Mr. FULTON. If there had been a conspiracy, surely there would have been an organization, and with the organization there would have been leadership. The Senator says they were there looking for somebody to lead them.

Mr. BULKELEY. I have assumed that of the 250 or 200 men who assembled on Elizabeth street these raiders composed but a small part of that crowd. It is not claimed by anybody that they exceeded either ten or fifteen in number.

Mr. FULTON. Nevertheless, I submit if those people had previously organized and were in a conspiracy they had leaders, and had the mob desired a leader they would have led, because they were organized. I submit the Senator will have to find a better explanation than that to show that a mob had gathered there and they were those who had done the shooting.

Mr. LODGE. There is no evidence of it.

Mr. BULKELEY. There is no evidence, I admit. I said I would look for their hiding place among this crowd of men who were appealing for a leader to take them down and assail the fort. I refer to the testimony of the mayor on that point. He said, Hearings, volume 3, page 2386:

Everybody was clamoring and standing around there with these guns, and saying, "Let's go down to the post," and, "Let's go down and do those fellows up." I don't remember the exact language they used, in the excitement of the moment, and I saw that the excitement was getting intense, and Judge Parks was standing to my left, and I said, "Get me a box or something to stand on," and they brought me, I do not remember whether it was a box or a barrel, and I got up and I appealed to the people, first, as an ex-Army officer, and I told them, "I have served with those troops and I know them to be as efficient troops as there are in the world. They are splendidly armed, and if you go down there many a valuable life will be lost."

And I think that was true. Mayor Combe proceeds:

"Besides that, you are within the law. Remain so, and we will get justice." I spoke in that strain for a few minutes. Then I told them that as mayor of the city I would arrest any man that remained on the street. I then went to several of the most prominent citizens there, bank cashiers and bank directors and county clerks, and so on, and I said, "Gentlemen, you will assist me in dispersing these people here;" and in groups we got them away; very reluctantly, but they got away. There remained on the streets the police officers and several of the citizens whom I requested to remain. I told them to arm themselves, if they were not armed.

This proposed attack upon the post by these citizens conforms entirely to my theory that the post was originally attacked for the purpose of drawing the troops out unarmed, and when that failed these desperadoes, as they had grown to be in their murderous career, were seeking to attack the post as the only remedy.

This is entirely in accord with the views of Major Penrose, who immediately assembled his command and placed his whole battalion in position to defend the post.

In this connection, I would say that the first gun, and the only gun, identified in the hands of a citizen, who was about to enter Crixell's saloon, was a Winchester, which the mayor found—as he advanced down Elizabeth street—in front of Crixell's saloon or gambling house. The mayor, evidently disturbed, exclaimed, "What are you doing with that gun?" and took it away from him and did not wait for any talk at all.

Hearings, volume 33, page 2384:

* * * A. * * * I went on down the street, and when I got opposite Crixell's saloon I saw a man about to go into the saloon with a gun in his hand. I afterwards found it to be an old Winchester rifle.

By Senator WARNER:

Q. The shooting was all over by this time?—A. The shooting was over; yes, sir. I halted him. I knew the man. His name was Jose Garza, or Tamayo, or something of the kind. I know him very well. He sometimes has acted as a special policeman. I halted him, and he stopped, and I said, "What are you doing with that gun?" And I took it away from him. I did not wait for any talk at all, and I said, "Get in there," and I put him in the saloon, and Mr. Crixell said, "That is my rifle." That is Crixell, the saloon keeper. So I gave the gun to him. They attempted to work the mechanism, and it would not work, while I was standing there, right in the saloon. As I walked into the saloon there was a chorus of remarks, such as "Mr. Mayor, the negroes are shooting on the town."

I can readily identify this party as one of the raiders seeking shelter in the saloon or gambling house where he would be welcome and from which the soldiers had been excluded. The possibilities are great that this gun was the one described by Mrs. Leahy, which seemed to her keen vision to be out of order when the firing was going on in the vicinity of Cowen alley and Fourteenth street. This gun was owned by Crixell, or claimed to be, and I fail to find any reason for its being on the street in the hands of another person.

The honorable Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has intimated that the love of the soldier for his "pass," and their deprivation of the same, was one of the causes that led up to the affray; but I submit, Mr. President, that during their two weeks' stay in Brownsville they had not been deprived of this highly esteemed convenience; it was not until after 5 o'clock of the afternoon of the 13th that any order was issued discontinuing or revoking passes, and this, at the earnest request of Mayor Combe, whose testimony on that point I quote. And this was on the afternoon before the "shooting up" of the town.

Mayor Combe testifies, volume 3, page 2382, Hearings:

I then said to him, in the presence of Mr. Evans, "Major Penrose, this is a terrible affair. The people in town are very much incensed and excited, and I protest against any of your officers or men"—I do not remember now whether I said "officers," but positively I said his men—"going into town to-night." Then I made use of one or the other of these expressions, "Major, if you allow these men to go into town to-night, I will not be responsible for their lives," or "Major, do not allow your men to go out of the post, because there is a great deal of danger in town." One or the other of these expressions I used—I am not sure which.

And again, in reply to an inquiry, Mayor Combe says, Hearings, volume 3, page 2387:

"The citizens are very much excited, and this is terrible," or something to that effect. He said, "Major Combe, I can not believe it. It has been reported to me that the citizens have fired on the post." I said, "No, sir; that is not so." We were in conversation some little while; I do not remember the details now. I said to him, "Major Penrose, you will have to keep your officers and men in the post. They can not come into town under any circumstances, and I hope that you will issue that order, because the people are very much excited and very much enraged, and if any of your men come in, why, it is dangerous"—or, I do not remember whether I used that expression—"I will not answer for their lives." At any rate, I impressed upon him strongly that it would be dangerous for his officers and men to go into the town. He said to me, "Major Combe, I shall certainly cooperate with you in this respect. I shall issue an order that none of my officers or men shall go into the town."

GUNS, CAP, SHELLS, ETC.

The articles picked up in the streets of Brownsville appear to have constituted, in connection with the so-called identification by eyewitnesses, the most incriminating evidence against the soldiers, and these two items of evidence appear to have been the basis of the changed opinion formed by Major Penrose, who, up to the time of the appearance of Mayor Combe with these exhibits, had persisted that the attack was made upon his command and the post, which I have before stated he prepared to defend.

It is claimed that these shells—almost universally exploded cartridges—were picked up in the streets of the city in the early morning after the affray, as well as clips, bandoliers, and a cap belonging to a member of the battalion, which cap, although bearing the initial of the soldier and thus readily traced to its owner, suddenly disappeared as a factor after the investigation by the citizens' committee, before whom it was produced. It was readily proved that this was of that class of articles that had been disposed of or thrown away and appropriated by the Mexican scavengers, as heretofore testified by large numbers of the soldiers. Its appearance on the streets at this opportune time and its early use as evidence, as well as its immediate elimination, are, to my mind, strong evidence of the well-conceived conspiracy, and a part of it, to compel the removal of the colored troops from that locality. I append here the testimony of Charles W. Askew, the reputed owner of the cap, and which was marked with his initials.

Hearings, volume 1, page 560:

Q. Captain McDonald?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How do you know it was by his suggestion?—A. He sent me up there one day.
Q. How do you know it was by his suggestion?—A. He sent me up there one day, and I had some caps, and Captain Macklin sent me up there to the administration building, and he asked me how many caps I had drawn since I had been in the Twenty-fifth Infantry.
Q. How many caps you had drawn?—A. Yes, sir. I think they found a cap downtown with my initials in it.
Q. With C. W. A., isn't it?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. He found that down the street?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you think that is what led to your arrest?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Tell us all about that cap. Tell us anything you may have to say about that.—A. I gave the first sergeant one of my old caps when I was at Fort Niobrara, and there was a box of old caps that was shipped down to Fort Brown, and when they got down there they opened that box of old caps, and some of those muchachos, I suppose, found them and got them and carried them away; and I think that is the way they got that cap.
Q. Do you know anything about the cap?—A. No, sir; I never saw the cap.

The shells and bandoliers still remain to be accounted for. It is in evidence, and unchallenged, that a box of exploded shells, etc., was brought down from Fort Niobrara and was deposited upon the back porch of the barracks of B Company, where they were open to the careful search and appropriation by anyone, as testified to by Sergt. Mingo Sanders.

It is uncontradicted that such a box was brought and opened and exposed, and finally a guard put on it to protect it from further depredation.

Hearings, volume 1, page 300-301:

Q. You had about 1,600 shells that you put in boxes?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And took to Brownsville because they had not been decapped?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you put those out on the back porch after you got there?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see that box there?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was the box open?—A. Yes, sir; the box was open, on the back porch.
Q. And could anybody have taken shells out of that box?—A. Yes, sir; anybody that wanted to, because they were compelled—because the Mexicans was so bad down there, picking up clothing and everything that was on the porch, or anything else that was around there, until the commanding officer issued an order to put on that post—to not allow people to pick up and carry away things that didn't belong to them.
Q. That was the reason why that guard was put on there?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And that was some days after your arrival?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Because the Mexicans were running in and picking up everything they could?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you see them pick up —A. Caps, clothing, shoes, and these arctic overshoes, and blouses, and trousers, and everything else. They would pick up everything, whether it was serviceable or not.
Q. All the old cans you would throw out and everything else—they would pick up?—A. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Q. But you heard these balls going overhead—you have been in battle, have you?—A. Yes, sir; I have; a good deal.
Q. You were at El Caney?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. At Santiago?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And in the Philippines?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you were in engagements in all those places?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. So you have heard a good deal of firing, and you have also heard a good deal of firing on the target range?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Can you tell the committee whether that was what I will call mixed firing, with different arms, or whether the firing was all with the same kind of arm?—A. It was mixed arms. I suppose there were six-shooters and Winchesters and all calibers, and there may have been some Mausers in it, because it has a keen sound. A Winchester has a very broad sound, like something very loud.
Q. What kind of a noise did those balls make that went over your head while you were lying down?—A. They made a kind of flat noise. It is a kind of experience that a man must more or less have himself that has been under fire. The Krag bullet and the Mauser bullet, too, makes a kind of whiz. It goes "the-ee-ew,"—something of that kind [witness imitating sound].

Senator FORAKER. I am afraid the stenographer can not get that down.

By Senator FORAKER:

Q. It makes a keen sound?—A. Yes, sir; and you can't tell whether the gun is in a tree or on the ground, or close to you or far from you. But these other guns go "boo-oo," something like that [indicating sound], what we in our way of determining call a blunderbuss; and that's the way those guns sound—a loud noise.

Q. Did that firing sound to you like it was firing from a Springfield rifle, such as you had at that time?—A. No, sir.

The careful examination by Captain Macklin, detailed by Major Penrose to seek in the Garrison road and vicinity for any evidence to fix the guilt upon participants in the affray, disclosed this remarkable finding, and goes far to establish the distribution of exploded shells upon the streets—obtained in the way described by Sergeant Sanders—of the conspiracy to fix the shooting up of the town upon the garrison. I ask your close attention to the testimony of Captain Macklin in regard to the finding of the "bunch" of shells and clips, for the reason that it conforms absolutely to the theory that I have formed, that it would be impossible for cartridges fired from high-power guns by a body of moving troops, the exploded shells ejected from the magazine to fall in such a position as the captain found these shells and clips—seven clips, each ordinarily containing five shells, and but six exploded shells—which, after the rapid firing described by many witnesses, would hardly be a fair proportion of either class. It is also a remarkable coincidence that, so far as I recall the evidence or have been able to examine it, these shells and clips are all that have been reported as found between the Cowen house, at Fourteenth street, and the Garrison road, or Fifteenth street, where the first and a considerable part of the firing took place.

Without reading the testimony I will state in a general way that clips and shells, five or six of one and seven of the other, were found in a place about 10 inches in diameter. It is the testimony of Army officers who appeared before us, and it is the uncontradicted opinion of Army officers everywhere with whom I have been able to discuss these questions, that it is absolutely impossible that shells and clips fired from a high-power rifle and ejected therefrom, as they must be after each shell is fired, could have landed in any such position, and the only reasonable conclusion that can be reached is that that "bunch" of shells in that narrow space was placed there and never fired from any rifle whatever that night.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Were there any soldiers' caps found there?
